Abstract

Père Lachaise, the first garden cemetery, which opened outside Paris in 1804, was created in response to changing attitudes to death and the overcrowding of Parisian burial grounds. This new form of sacred landscape became incredibly successful and was widely copied by other cemeteries in Europe and North America. Highgate cemetery to the north of London opened in 1839 and was directly compared at the time to Père Lachaise, as were the other early London Cemeteries, now known as the Magnificent Seven. This thesis examines the complex landscape development of these two cemeteries up until the outbreak of The Great War in 1914 and assesses how directly the Père Lachaise model was applied at Highgate. These spaces help us understand the changing ways death was understood and ritualised through funerals in this period, not just as passive mirrors of society but also places where these attitudes and meanings were actively negotiated. These cemeteries were also designed from the beginning to accommodate the expectation of visitors spending their leisure time in cemeteries, which also effected their form and function and allowed cemeteries and the monuments within them further chances to influence social practices more widely.

Garden cemeteries offered new opportunities for monumentalising the dead, making gravestones open to a wider section of the public than ever before. This led to many innovations in style, form and decoration. The elite, who had previously had a virtual monopoly on monuments now looked at innovative ways of designing monuments which would maintain a differentiation between their graves and the others in the cemetery. Although grave monuments are primarily erected as a focus for private grief and to aid with the location of dead loved ones, all monuments also present a carefully curated identity of the deceased to the world. For the 'notable' dead - those with a public profile, their monuments must also serve a public function, as sites of memory which help maintain this image in the collective memory. This thesis examines the ways these monuments achieve this and what their wider effect on cemetery development was.

Dedication

This thesis is dedicated to Ashley Peter Hunt for unwavering support.
Ash - when we met, I was just starting on my cemetery journey – thank you so much for staying along for the ride. I love you more than words can say, and I couldn't have done this without you. Here's to the rest of our lives together- I promise you'll never have to hold an umbrella over soggy field notes, or shiver in a snowy cemetery again. Are you ready to start the next chapter together?

Acknowledgments

Thank you to Mum, Dad, Steve, Nana, Nana & Grandad and all the family for the unconditional love and support – some of you didn't see the end of this journey but I know you are all really proud of me and I love you so much. You made this possible in so many ways – not least in terms of places to live and financial assistance at various stages in the process!

Thank you to Paul Garwood for being my supervisor, I owe you so much for believing in my work for over a decade now – that undergrad dissertation was the beginning of everything. I'm not sure you knew what a marathon you were signing up for back then, but I hope it's been worth it. Thank you to Henry Chapman and Harold Mytum for being my examiners, your comments and corrections on this work have been hugely beneficial.

Thank you to Ian Dungavell and all the staff at Highgate Cemetery for your patience and willingness to open the gates to me every time I've needed to visit. I'm so glad that the most magical place in London is in such good hands.

Thank you to all the people in the heritage world who have supported and mentored my career over the last 8 years, you will never know how many skills you gave me that helped with this process; special mentions to Sarah Hayes and Irene De Boo for being my champions and to Luke Crane and Bev Nash for making my dreams of working in cemeteries a reality. A big shout out to all the dedicated and passionate colleagues and volunteers I've worked with – your faith in me is finally being rewarded! Thanks to the Coffin Works for giving me a desk to work from during the frantic final months of both drafting and corrections.

Thank you to everyone who let me sleep in their spare rooms, on their sofas or on their floors while doing London fieldwork: Alex Gilbert, Dan and Sue Wall, Lloyd Thomas and Lilly Cadwallader, Gabby Hicks, Sophie de Jonge, Holly Snaith and Heather Scott, plus all the kids and pets that made those trips so joyful.

Thank you to the Cemetery Research Group and all my cemetery loving colleagues around the world – you get it and that makes it all worthwhile

Thanks to all the friends who believed in me, offered advice, acted as sounding boards, fed me, dug me out from under mountains of paper, reminded me to sleep and/or occasionally kicked me up the bum especially; Abby, Anya, Bill, Dave, Dennis, Donna, Elaine, Janine, Jo, Kat, Kate, Kelly, Kim, Lex, Norma, Olivia, Philippa, Rahma, Rachel, Sam, Steph and Suzanne. I've probably forgotten someone because my brain is now entirely filled with gravestone designs and mortuary French– please forgive me and know I still love you all. Thank you for cheering me on and showing me there is way through to the sunny uplands of post-PhD life!

Chapter One – Introduction

1.1 Research topic

The 19th century saw a fundamental change in the way the dead were buried and commemorated across much of the Western world, beginning in the newly industrialised states of Northwest Europe. The creation of a new kind of sacred landscape, the garden cemetery, was the culmination of cultural change which began around 1750, thanks to the industrial revolution, when rapid growth in urban populations caused severe overcrowding of parish churchyards and changing attitudes towards death (Etlin 1984a, ix-x). The creation of these landscapes, and the forms of monumental architecture associated with them, will be explored more fully in chapter 3. They grew and developed throughout the 19th and early 20th centuries but in 1914, the outbreak of the WWI, revolutionised cemetery design again, partly inspired by the simple uniform monuments commemorating the mass casualties of war (Worpole 2003, 164).

This thesis traces the development of garden cemeteries, focusing on Père Lachaise in Paris, which was the first and opened in 1804 and investigating its influence on Highgate cemetery in London. There are many renowned people interred at Père Lachaise, and the monuments to several of them are reputed to have exerted an early influence on the popularity and nature of this burial ground (Etlin 1984a, 344; Curl 2000, 25-26). This thesis investigates whether later burials of significant dead continued to have this effect, and whether a similar trend is be seen at Highgate, another cemetery with 'notable' inhabitants.

This thesis therefore particularly addresses the role which the elite had on funerary practices. This was an era when members of the upper and middle classes who moved in intellectual and artistic circles were able to exert an influence on the public imagination, sometimes encouraged by the government, such as through state funerals (Wolfe 2000, Ben-Amos 2000). This thesis examines the level of influence exerted on the cemetery landscapes and monumental designs by ‘notable’ figures.

Cemeteries give us a window into the reflexive relationship between funerary practices and wider social change because 'the dead to not bury themselves but are treated of and disposed of by the living’ (Parker Pearson 1999: 3). We know from the work of Tarlow (1999, 2000a, 2000b, 2012) that personal ties, emotions and grief are central the choices made around commemoration of the dead using gravestones, and yet this is an era where funerals were accompanied by significant public display for all but the poorest. Therefore, we must also consider the public dimensions of these practices to gain a full understanding. This thesis investigates whether the relative importance of private grief vs public celebration for an individual burial can be determined through studying their memorials and landscape context.

This thesis shows that the relative paucity of cemetery studies compared to research on other types of burial grounds still needs to be addressed, as there is great value to found in this type of study. Although the landscape development of Père Lachaise was fairly well understood, the changes post-1874 had been neglected by the scope of Etlin's (1984a) work, and there was no similarly detailed foundation for Highgate, so this thesis breaks new ground for our understanding of the landscape development there, especially the opportunity to apply new techniques such as viewshed analysis. Conversely, although previous archaeological research provides a useful basis for analysis of funerary monuments, existing work has not focused on French examples and so the case study from Père Lachaise is of particular importance to the discipline. Many British case studies are also from churchyards, rather than cemeteries, so the analysis of Highgate is also helpful for understanding differences in monumentality in these settings even during the same time period.

1.1.1 Spaces of death

The shift from burial in churches and churchyards, usually in the parish where a person lived, to new extramural cemeteries occurred in most Northwest European cities between 1800 and 1850. Although these spaces had some things in common with earlier churchyards, they also had many new elements, which will be investigated in this thesis. Differentiation of social class by location, occurred in both in churches and their churchyards but this was demonstrated by closeness to 'the saints' and visibility to congregation who might pray over your tomb (Aries 1981, 72-74), whereas this thesis finds that in cemeteries, it was desirable to be close to 'the greats' and buried in highly visible locations, and thus be memorable to visitors. In churchyards it was usual to be buried facing east, in order to see sunrise on judgement day (Parker Pearson 1999, 6). In garden cemeteries grave orientation and location was affected by other factors, as this thesis shows, often related to visibility and efficient use of space.

The garden cemetery although drawing on some features of its predecessors; churchyards and some rarer examples of burial grounds not linked to churches (Curl 1984, 224-225) was also a combination of other influences. Including Roman extra-mural road-side cemeteries (Etlin 1984a, 230), colonial cemeteries in India (Curl 2000, 28-32) and English Romantic gardens (Worpole 2003, 90). Churchyards had typically been a relatively small, enclosed area surrounding the church, with little vegetation, sparse memorialisation and often visual reminders of the physicality of death like bones (Etlin 1984a, 12-14). This was a space which might be sacred or mundane, for example burial grounds being used for markets (Etlin 1984a, 14) but was rarely pleasant, at least in urban areas (Mytum 2004, 45). In contrast garden cemeteries are more open, with an idealised natural setting to evoke an Elysian idyll where monumental architecture acted as mnemonics for the dead (Etlin 1984a, 187).

They were designed to accommodate funerals and other visits in an enjoyable, if melancholy environment, designed to mask the horrors of death with the comforts of natural beauty (Curl 2000, 17).

Within the public communal space of the churchyard, most people were unable to choose burial close to their loved ones, and family ties could only be preserved by those wealthy enough to create a family chapel, vault or tomb. In France during the 18th century most people were buried in common graves with a large number of other people (Etlin 1984a, 37), although at this time this was rarer in Britain except in times of plague or disaster, there was still a significant amount of grave disturbance and intercutting, with the exception of protected family vaults or mausolea which can be seen in some churchyards (Curl 1984, 223). Within the garden cemetery the ability to purchase plots in perpetuity enabled widespread creation of private spaces within the public cemetery and enabled a far larger proportion of people to choose a last resting place with family (Curl 2000, 111-112).

The value of cemetery landscapes to historians was highlighted 1984 when The Journal of Garden History released a special edition (volume 4, issue 3), focused on nineteenth-century developments in cemeteries, but also an exploration of their inspirations by earlier gardens (J. D. H. 1984, 209). It included an introduction to Etlin's work on Père Lachaise, encouraging readers to pursue the topic further in his book from which it was adapted (Etlin 1984b, 222) and also an overview of the design of Early British cemeteries by Curl (1984), alongside a number of articles exploring the rural cemetery movement in America (Rotundo 1984, Morgan 1984, Schuyler 1984), all of which profiled the influence of romantic gardens in particular on early cemeteries in Europe, and how the differing relationship to the 'picturesque' and landscape in America affected their adoption across the Atlantic. Curl further built on this work with his publications on the Victorian Celebration of Death (2000), Kensal Green Cemetery (2001a-e) and Death and Architecture (2002).

Landscape archaeology has been used to investigate landscapes of death dating back to the Neolithic and in every corner of the world (David and Thomas 2008). The study of funerary archaeology and of monumentality have been fundamental to the field of archaeology since its inception. However, the application of landscape archaeological methods to landscapes designed in the 19th century did not become common until the last 15 years or so (Hicks and Beaudry 2006, Gaimster and Majewski 2009 and Orser et al 2020). Garden cemeteries as a specific landscape remain underutilised by archaeologists, as notable archaeological works like those of Mike Parker Pearson (1982) and Sarah Tarlow (1999) both focused more on monumentality than on the wider landscape development, although Tarlow did suggest new approaches to the landscape from the perspective of those who were choosing burials rather than designers or reformers (2000a), tying into her wider work on emotions in archaeology (2000b and 2012). Harold Mytum highlights the rich resource available to historical archaeologists in burial grounds – looking at their landscapes and organisation, but also particularly at the monuments, working extensively on British, Irish and recently also Australian examples (e.g. 2004a, 2004b, 2018)

1.1.2 Monumentality

Garden cemeteries also presented a new opportunity for monumentality because of the relative affordability of a 'final' resting place, making permanent memorials a worthwhile investment for many for the first time. This increased the importance of the family plot, with a memorial to commemorate family ties (Curl 2000, 111-112). This allows more investigation of the role which memorials played in managing grief and emotional relationships with the deceased, building on the work of Tarlow (1999, 2000a) and the lifecycle or biography of these monuments as they continued to be visited and, in many cases, altered to acknowledge additional bereavements (Mytum, 2004a).

Monumentality in churches had been limited to the very wealthy, and 'permanent' memorials in the churchyard were rare before the 17th century, partially discouraged by the impermanent nature of burial, re-use of graves roughly once per generation, and of course by expense, with extremely limited options for building more permanent options like funerary chapels and bricked vaults. Memorial forms were also limited, usually slabs, chest tombs and wall memorials within churches, although regional differences existed, for instance in France wall plaques were also common in charniers outside the main church (Etlin 1984a, 14). In British churchyards, headstones were rare before the late 17th century and those which existed were small and locally made (Mytum 2000, 3).

The memorials in garden cemeteries took inspiration from a wider range of sources, including the classical world, ancient Egypt, Mughal India and Gothic Architecture (Worpole 2003, Curl 2002). Import of exotic stone and the improvement of stone cutting and mass production techniques reduced the cost of memorials (Mytum 2000, 64-66), until they were accessible for the majority by the early 20th century.

The vast majority of publications which have tackled the subject of garden cemeteries in the last 40 years have done so from a social or architectural history standpoint, including the work of Curl (1984, 2000, 2002), Etlin (1984a, 1984b), Linden-Ward (1989) and Ariès (1981). The interdisciplinary nature of death studies however offers interpretative approaches from other disciplines including sociology and anthropology, in particular studies which look at how funerary rituals and the monuments which are raised after them are used to negotiate and construct identities in death (e.g. van Gennep 1960, Turner 1986, Binford 1971 and Saxe 1970).

1.1.3 Death rituals

Late 18th and 19th century change to funerary ritual is often said to be characterised as the 'Dechristianisation of death' (Ariès 1981, Etlin 1984a, 1984b) because no longer were the dead seen as integral to the life of the parish as the living, instead representing a corrupting influence rather than a sacred one.

In Paris the distancing of the dead resulted in a change to funerary ritual during the revolutionary period, with the funeral service no longer being performed at the graveside, instead the body was taken straight from the home or perhaps the church in the case of wealthy parishioners to the burial ground, accompanied not by the family or clergy but by porters only. This was seen as a positive change by many, sparing the family from facing the horrors of the grave. Some early visionaries hoped that the cemetery would instead become a place for quiet reflection and moral improvement (Curl 2000, 26), a goal which was eventually realised in garden cemeteries, which became as much a place to visit for recreation as for funerals. During the 19th century, the role of the procession and graveside ceremony reappeared in a more secular form and gained great importance.

Funerary ritual in Britain also grew in importance during the late 18th and 19th centuries, especially the role of the funeral procession travelling from the home to the cemetery, which in Britain often had multiple chapels for different denominations.

The pomp and display of the procession, as well as the number of mourners in attendance gained huge significance in both countries, especially for prominent figures who might have thousands of people in attendance (Wolfe 2000, Ben-Amos 2000). Religious freedom to perform funerary ritual as desired was also an important part of the development of garden cemeteries within Britain (Curl 2000, 42), and in France funerary ritual was often tied to political expression (Ben-Amos 2000, Kselman 1993).

1.1.4 Power

The churches and churchyards of the 18th century and before emphasised two kinds of power, the power gained by hereditary wealth which many saw as part of the divine order of things, and also the power of the church as the only way to ensure eternal life. This was emphasised not just by the reservation of the areas closest to the altar for the burial of clergy, but also the importance placed on burial within consecrated ground, and the exclusion of ‘undesirables’ including unbaptised infants, suicides, strangers and criminals (Ariès 1981, 42-45).

In general, the changes which happened to funerals and burials took power and away from the church and into the hands of the state, with the exception of early joint-stock cemeteries in Britain which were owned by private organisations (Curl 2000). Either of these groups might have explicit ideas about how power and status should be displayed within the cemetery – beginning with the revolutionary French idea to only allow memorials within the champs de repos which commemorated 'great men' to inspire the visitor, selected to embody the ideals of the new republic (Etlin 1984a, 229), some of these ideas were incorporated into the garden cemetery model. Some garden cemeteries in the British Isles also aimed to create a specific picture of society, for example Glasgow Necropolis which was owned by the Merchants House, who had to approve any memorial design for the cemetery (Scott 2005, 55), with monuments to the city's great and good clustered around the summit of the hill, whilst the common graves for poorer Glaswegians were hidden on the lower slopes of the cemetery (Scott 2005, 219).

1.2 Research Aims

The timeframe for analysis in this thesis will be 1804-1914, from the beginning of the garden cemetery movement with the construction of Père Lachaise, and ending with the outbreak of WWI because of the significant and rapid change that occurred after this date.

This thesis aims to study the use of landscape and monuments in garden cemeteries with an especial focus on the impact made by burials of elite and influential individuals. It will examine the features and trends seen at Père Lachaise, where the importance of relocating 'Great' French dead to the cemetery in sparking initial popularity is well documented (Etlin 1984a, 344; Curl 2000, 25-26), and compare these to the development of Highgate cemetery in London. The study will attempt to determine the longer-term effects on development of monuments to renowned figures had at Père Lachaise, and whether any similar trends can be seen at Highgate cemetery, investigating the similarities, differences and mutual influences of these important cemeteries. Highgate, like Père Lachaise, is known for being the final resting place of many eminent people and was as popular in its heyday as a fashionable burial location.

Research into garden cemeteries allows exploration of both large-scale funerary landscape and small-scale monumental design, as well as aesthetic, cultural and social change in the 19th and 20th centuries. This study aims to review previous interpretations and develop new approaches for understanding garden cemeteries, by engaging with existing studies of ceremonial landscapes, space, monumentality, social status and funerary ritual, it will draw on theories from many fields to build on the strength which an interdisciplinary approach has given to the study of death and burial in the last 40 years.

This study focuses primarily on the burial of influential individuals because although it is widely stated that elite funerary practices influenced expectations and customs for all classes (e.g. Curl 2000; 121) especially for funeral or mourning attire and customs, the influence of the elite on cemeteries has not been directly investigated through their monuments and burial locations. As garden cemeteries were 'essentially geared towards the middle-class market (and even, in some cases, towards the aristocracy, or those who aspired to, or emulated, the aristocracy)' (Curl 2000; 111) they are the perfect location to investigate the effects of fashions started by illustrious members of these classes.

The research aims for this thesis are as follows:

1. Review critically previous approaches to the study of space, ritual, monumentality and power and utilise these to elucidate funerary practices in the case study cemeteries.
2. Establish overall spatial and chronological development for each cemetery up to 1914, including understanding the factors which influence cemetery design. Investigate the factors which affect the choice of grave plot for significant members of society ('notable' burials) and any impact these have on the cemetery landscape
3. Identify typical monumentality and chronological development for each cemetery up to 1914. Understand the factors which affect the style and form of monuments to 'notable' individuals and any wider impact they have on monumentality.
4. Undertake comparative analysis of findings from both cemeteries to establish the degree to which Père Lachaise acted as a model for Highgate cemetery and how their development diverges over time.

1.3 Methodology

The main focus of this thesis is on fieldwork conducted in both cemeteries, primarily memorial recording using a process based on the methods of Mytum (2000), updated to accommodate recent technological advances- particularly the easy availability of good quality digital photography

The first fieldwork sample for each cemetery consists of a group of influential or 'notable' persons. Criteria for inclusion in this sample included date of death (1804-1914) and documented evidence of a public profile during life. Resources created by the cemetery authorities in each case were used as a starting point and then further research was done to ensure the people listed fit the selection criteria, for example politicians, business owners, military leaders, writers, scientists, artists and sports people who were mentioned in contemporary newspapers, dictionaries of biographies or other similar documents. See Appendix 2 and 3 for selection tables.

The second, and largest set of fieldwork data is the graves which directly surround the 'notable' graves, allowing them to be placed in context alongside other burials in plots of a comparable price bracket and also examine any 'pull effect' they had at a local scale.

Finally, a small random sample of 25 graves from across each cemetery was generated (to match the size of the 'notable' burials sample at Père Lachaise). The random sample was selected using a random number generator to select map square/division, row and grave, always starting at the southwest corner of the selected map square/division. The graves selected for these samples can be found in Appendix 2 (Père Lachaise) and Appendix 3 (Highgate).

The fieldwork data will be used alongside a variety of documentary sources including cemetery records, local authority records, newspapers and maps of the cemeteries to provide the primary data. The interpretive approaches for this thesis, as discussed in chapter 2, are strongly multidisciplinary and cover the literature surrounding analysis of space, ritual, monumentality and power. A number of scholars have published on the topic of garden cemeteries, or one of the case study cemeteries in particular, and these publications will be discussed in chapter three.

1.4 Thesis Structure

This thesis consists of nine chapters, the purpose of each will now be briefly outlined. The current chapter one aims to introduce the topic of research, the aims of the thesis and how they were carried out with reference to the wider context of archaeological and cross-disciplinary study of funerary practice. Chapter two is where the theoretical basis for this thesis, with regards to four key elements; space, ritual, monumentality and power, is set out. This provides a framework for the analysis which follows. Chapter three provides more background information about how rapid change in 18th and 19th century NW Europe lead to the creation of garden cemeteries as a whole, and Père Lachaise in particular, before going into the specifics of the movement within the British Isles and finally focusing on Highgate cemetery as case study. Chapters four to seven, tackle the data analysis needed to answer research aims one and two. Chapter four looks at the landscape of Père Lachaise, followed by chapter five about the landscape of Highgate. Chapters six and seven are about the monumentality of Père Lachaise and Highgate respectively. The comparative analysis, for research aim three, will take place in Appendix 4 to save repetition of figures and data, before Chapter eight brings together all the research aims and overall synthesis of the four different interpretive lenses set out in Chapter two. Chapter nine is the concluding chapter, and also highlights opportunities for further research.

Chapter Two – Interpretative approaches

2.1 Introduction

The theoretical underpinning of this thesis focuses on four main themes which will be considered in turn in this chapter, although when carrying out the analysis and interpretation they can never be fully separated. Cemeteries are sacred landscapes where rituals including funerals and grave visiting take place. Their monumentality forms part of the built environment and affects how people understand and behave in the space. The ritual types and monumental forms reflect a range of meanings including power dynamics within 19th century society. The scholarship reviewed below offers a range of possible approaches to building a fuller understanding of the cemeteries and the particular graves in this study.

2.2 Space

Tilley states that there is no space, only spaces (1994, 10) and Rapoport categorises all human space as designed space (Rapoport 1994; 478). Space is not a passive backdrop; it is an active medium which is involved in and cannot be divorced from human action (Tilley 1994; 10). Spatial organisation is fundamental and inescapable (Rapoport 1994; 485) because landscapes exist through people's interaction with them (Ashmore 2010; 167). Many scholars have attempted to find ways to categorise and understand both spaces and the people who inhabit them.

Spatial order is socially determined and cannot be understood without also understanding the 'symbolically constructed lifeworlds of social actors' (Tilley 1994; 10-11). Lifeworlds, which can also be described as 'conceptions of the cosmos' (Ashmore 2010; 167) are integral to use of space. We cannot study the physical manifestations of spatial organisation without considering their relationship to society, behaviour, the sacred, mythology and other aspects of space (Rapoport 1994; 465).

Understanding spatial organisation from an outside perspective is a challenge all researchers face, but it is especially difficult for archaeologists who must recreate the way people in the past viewed the space around them (Parker Pearson and Richards 1994; 4). All societies recognise some features of their landscape (if not the whole earth) as special (Ashmore and Knapp 1999;1), but the archaeologist needs to recognise those sites based on the material evidence available and then use them to reliably interpret the cosmic order (Ashmore 2010; 167). The material clues to social meaning can be ambiguous, and meaning is not always obtrusively marked in archaeologically detectable ways (Ashmore and Knapp 1999; 2), for instance some practices such as oral storytelling, dance, and music, leave few traces. Therefore, some scholars believe the term 'built environment' can be unhelpful because it obscures the 'unbroken continuum in how people inhabit and identify their surroundings' (Ashmore and Knapp 1999; 16) and the fundamental truth that all landscapes are thought before they are built.

Our landscapes form part of social memory and sites of special importance are permanently transformed by human agency, whether they are physically marked or simply related to oral tradition (Schechner 1994; 618). Where physical marking of spatial organisation develops, social and cultural phenomena tend to 'condense' at these special sites (Kuper 1972). The 'most obtrusive and formal markings are architectural' (Ashmore and Knapp 1999; 15) and therefore provide the best evidence for archaeologists.

This is because architecture and 'the built environment' make spatial order visible (Rapoport 1994; 460), they are a deliberate attempt to create and bound space (Tilley 1994; 17). In Western Europe today space is generally viewed in a geometric way, which can be surveyed, mapped, and navigated but there are an extraordinary variety of 'built environments' cross-culturally and over time, based on different spatial and conceptual organisation patterns (Rapoport 1994; 460).

The form of the built environment is partly dependent on the nature and abundance of resources, both manifest resources, and latent, symbolic, and social ones (Rapoport 1994; 467). Much of the variability in built environments is in response to these cultural resources. Manifest constraints can be satisfied in many ways, so it is latent aspects of human activities which find the most prominent expression in built environments (Rapoport 1994; 472).

The relationship between people and architecture is reflexive and dynamic; 'we shape our buildings and they shape us' (Basso 1996; 55). The settings, rooms, buildings, and other spaces that make up the built environment contain physical cues which act as mnemonics, reminding those who are aware of the cultural rules what behaviour is appropriate (Rapoport 1994; 462). These cues can be in the form of fixed elements of architecture, but also semi-fixed features like furnishing (Rapoport 1994; 463), which may even be of greater significance due to the ease with which they can be moved or changed, allowing them to respond more quickly to social or cultural change (Rapoport 1994; 464).

When studying spatial organisation, we need to ask the questions, 'who does what, where, when, including/excluding whom and why?' (Rapoport 1994; 466). Sack (1987; 21-22) provides one useful model which can help answer these questions by dividing spatial organisation into 3 main elements which are summarised in Figure 1.

This is particularly instructive when combined with Rapoport's work which illuminates the latent or social aspects of social organisation by breaking 'meaning' into three levels which work together to enable users to behave appropriately and make co-action possible (1994; 473). This model is summarised in Figure 2.

Spaces and their meanings are invested with power and therefore we must remember that experiences within it are dependent on age, gender, social position, and relationship to others (Tilley 1994, 11), which presents an extra challenge to archaeologists trying to understand the way they were designed and used in the past. Tilley attempted to address this by developing an archaeological landscape phenomenology to explore the ways people attempt to bridge the gap between themselves and their surroundings through perceptions, actions, emotions and awareness, based on their systems of belief, decision making, remembrance and evaluation (Tilley 1994; 11-12). In this approach, 'an appreciation of landscape is largely based on a mixture of human imagination, learned visual responses and social perception, part historical, part aesthetic, part psychological. It is an active, dynamic relationship between the seer and the seen' (Worpole 2003; 21).

Tilley's work was developed as part of a broader scholarship which aimed to add 'social archaeology' including the investigation of monuments and ceremony into the 'landscape archaeology' of prehistoric periods which traditionally referred to the study of settlement and subsistence evidence, to enable researchers to recreate the cultural system which shaped the landscape (Ashmore and Knapp 1999, Bradley 1997). However, there are many landscapes of the historic period, including cemeteries, which can benefit from the application of these techniques.

Landscapes from the historic period have often been reconstructed solely using documentary evidence such as population data and accounts from the literate elite such as lords and clerics. This can place a heavy importance on the creation of narrative to reconstruct the past, with archaeological evidence being secondary to historic sources (Johnson 2006). There is also often an assumption that the people who created these landscapes thought about the world in a modern, Western way, from the 16th century onwards. Therefore, one criticism of the few existing studies of landscapes of religion in historical archaeology is that they often confine interpretations to formal Christian ritual (Gorringe 2002). This ignores the possibility that some aspects of the way the world was understood were expressed in ritual forms that were not necessarily Christian in form or content (Hutton 1994). This seems pertinent to this thesis when there is evidence of many older folk beliefs and superstitions about death continuing through the 19th century (Frisby 2019). It is also an era when alternative acceptance of views about life, death, and religion were common– including strong dissenting movements, spiritualism and popular belief in ghosts. At the same time secularism and agnosticism were being driven by advances in scientific discovery (Luckhurst 2014). Many cemeteries in this period, included specific provision for Christian denominations with differing views about burial practice and an increasing proportion, including Père Lachaise, also accommodated burial from non-Christian religions (see Chapter 4 and 5). Rapoport (1994) states that as societies become larger and more complex, there are more groups with diverse cognitive codes. This means that the same built environment may use different semi-fixed features to allow the settings and spaces to be employed differently (1994, 489) and a greater redundancy of cues communicating meaning is needed to ensure clarity (1994, 490). The survival or absence of these cues in cemeteries and cemetery buildings need to be considered when studying their use in the past.

Where ritual forms are Christian, they are rarely viewed anthropologically, in direct contrast to Prehistoric ritual sites. One scholar who has challenged this is Rahtz, who asked us to consider what Martians would make of the gravestones at Wharram Percy from first principals (under the non-de-plume Rilip Phatz 1985). Johnson (2006) suggests that the general lack of detached anthropological study may be due to the tendency to believe that the church and spirituality are one and the same, thus confining 'belief' to the parish church and making the rest of the landscape functional, ignoring the wider cultural perceptions of a spiritualised world. This seems especially dangerous after 1800 when burial was increasingly separated from the church in both France and England – with cemeteries owned by the state or private companies. As shown by numerous authors, the design of these landscapes took inspiration only partially from churchyards. Stronger influences include romantic gardens and other picturesque landscapes, also funerary traditions in a range of cultures including Ancient Rome, Greece and Egypt, as well as Colonial burial grounds in India and elsewhere (Etlin 1984a, Etlin 1984b, Curl 1984, 2000, 2001a-e and 2002, Mytum 2004a).

Cemeteries are sacred spaces and ceremonial landscapes. Ashmore defines ceremonial landscapes as 'settings in which arrangements of specific features situate the cosmos on earth, and where ritualised movements to and among these features are means to evoke and reinforce understandings of cosmic order' (2010, 167). Funerals and grave visiting both fit cemeteries into this category, and therefore we need to consider these cemeteries alongside literature about other ceremonial landscapes from past and present including the work of Bradley (1993, 1997), Thomas (1991, 1995), Ucko and Layton (1999). Taçon's work on ceremonial landscapes in Australia includes 'usual vantage points that "one comes upon suddenly" and 'vantage points with dramatic views' in a list of features most likely to 'invoke…feelings of awe, power, majestic beauty, respect [or] enrichment' in ceremonial landscapes (1999, 36-37, quoted in Ashmore 2010, 168). This is certainly very applicable to the designs of Père Lachaise and Highgate as we will see in Chapters 4 and 5.

Cemeteries have also been described as a good example of Foucault's (1967) concept of heterotopia. The six principals of heterotopology have been helpfully summarised by Clements (2017, 470) as shown in table 1. Although Foucault acknowledged this concept was undeveloped and without a precise definition, Johnson suggests that the cemetery is the most convincing application of the term (2013). Clements (2017) applies this to Highgate Cemetery and the counter-cultural figures like Karl Marx who are buried there, looking at the public space where death is managed, creative space where cemetery texts (funerary architecture) materialise memory and the 'counterpublic' space which expresses dissent. Elliott (2021) believes that Foucault's views on cemeteries as heterotopias apply more to those of post-revolutionary France than Britain or America (2021, 143) but does find it a useful framework for the study of Nottingham's General Cemetery and Church Cemetery.

Table 1 Six principles of heterotopology (Foucault 1967, Clements 2017, 470)

1	A sacred and forbidden place concerned with individuals in crisis who are undergoing a transitional rite of passage
2	A location situated beyond the centre of the city (created historically in response to bourgeois fears of contagion)
3	An amalgam of different geographic and sociocultural space which appears incompatible
4	A heterochronic site linked to time and its disrupture
5	somewhere isolated with its own regulatory vocabulary and behavioural codes
6	space of illusion which may be marginal or oppositional

To construct the most full and rigorous accounts about past landscapes and their meaning scholars should aim to combine the best practices from archaeology of the historical and prehistorical periods. For example, phenomenology has been criticised for its reliance on romanticist notions (Johnson 2006) and for a lack of 'tightly provenanced, systematic and rigorous data collection' (Corcos 2001). Ashmore thus places importance on reliability, stating that 'the most compelling works tend to be data-rich, with much empirical information' (2010; 171) to support the inferences made, and Corcos attempted to rectify these criticisms in his work on Shapwick and Moorlinch churches near Glastonbury by drawing on historical evidence to underpin the analysis, giving a fuller picture than the archaeology or documents alone. This thesis aims to continue this development of more effective cemetery analysis methodologies by using the largely underutilised landscapes of garden cemeteries.

2.3 Ritual and ceremony

Cemeteries are spaces in which many activities occur, the most important of which can be characterised as ritual – not just funerals, but also tending graves – both of those who were known in life, and those who were admired from afar. An understanding of ritual processes and their material traces is fundamental to understanding the purpose, meaning and use of cemeteries.

There are as many definitions of what ritual is as there are theorists who study it, because, as Bowie explains 'finding a definition of ritual which is broad enough to include the wide variety of human activities we might wish to describe under the heading "ritual" whilst still preserving some explanatory value is not straightforward.' (Bowie 2006; 140). Ritual is often seen at the most basic level as being 'symbolic activity as opposed to the instrumental behaviour of daily life' (Asad 1993, 55) but perhaps even this definition poses dangers. Richards warned against trying to find a single or simple explanation (1982, 169; cited in Bowie 2006, 141) because rituals are so multifaceted and sometimes they are outwardly difficult to separate from non-ritual, for example Quakers believe in the ‘sacrament of the everyday’, and they are just one of many groups who believe that all actions can be religious if they are directed towards God (Bowie 2006; 141).

Many commentators stress the formulaic nature of ritual as one of its defining features. Bowie disagrees, believing that rituals can in fact be more spontaneous or individual creations, such as the family burial of a pet rabbit with ‘spontaneous prayers and actions, and the accumulation of symbols (a flower, a memorial, a tree planted)’ (Bowie 2006; 141). However, this example is poorly chosen to illustrate this point – the funeral for a pet is not truly spontaneous but simply an adaptation of the existing cultural expectations, closely resembling contemporary practices for human funerary rites.

Tambiah’s definition of ritual is designed to accommodate ambiguity by allowing for the difference between ritual and non-ritual to be relative rather than absolute, defining ritual as ‘a culturally constructed system of symbolic communication’ (1979; 119). However, although meaning is central to current anthropological interpretation of ritual, this is not necessarily true for the participants for whom the ‘symbols’ may be seen as concrete things in their own right, or for whom the action, rather than any symbolic meaning, may be the point of the ritual (Bowie 2006, 143).

Ritual can have many different functions for individuals and for societies, Bowie suggests some of their functions are to; channel and express emotion, guide and reinforce behaviour, support or subvert status quo, bring about change, restore harmony and balance, have a role in healing, ensure the right relationships with the unseen world, facilitate succession of cultural values from generation to generation (Bowie 2006, 138). Bowie also states that rituals are dramatic and can be seen as performances. There are definitions which also emphasise ritual as ‘performance’ – (e.g. Alexander 1997, 139), and a number of theorists have explored the links between ritual and theatre which will be explored later in this chapter (e.g. Turner, Turnbull)

Table 2 6 categories of ritual, based on Bell (1997; 94)

Category	Description
1	Rites of passage and ‘life crisis’ rituals
2	Calendrical and commemorative rites
3	Rites of exchange and communion
4	Rites of affliction
5	Rites of feasting/fasting and festivals
6	Political rituals

However, these categories often overlap, as will be seen in this thesis – for example under this classification state funerals in Paris in the 19th century were both rites of passage and political rituals, and even the most ordinary funeral in London during the same period would be both a rite of passage and a rite of feasting, with attendees provided with refreshments after the burial. These categories are also of limited analytical value – they don't 'take us any further in understanding the purpose, function, mechanics or efficacy of the ritual process' (Bowie 2006, 143).

Although they can be seen to contain other elements, most scholars would agree that funerals are good examples of 'rites of passage' – those rituals which mark the transitions from one life stage to another or a change in status for an individual or group. As understood by van Gennep (1960), 'rites of passage' is a broad framework which is widely applicable to many rituals – not just 'life crisis' rituals such as birth, marriage, death and initiation (his original research focused on initiation) but also many other types of ritual such as pilgrimage, and seasonal rituals, in fact any religious or secular behaviour which displayed his threefold structure of separation, transition and reintegration and this could be discerned within almost all rituals. Rites of passage could also be described as moving into and out of a liminal phase (from the Latin limen – threshold, places which mediated between one physical space or another, or between one social state and another), the ceremonial passage through which was essential to allowing an individual to 'pass from one defined position to another' (1960, 3) within society (see figure 3). These rites of passage are processual dramas which mark the passing of time as well as continuity with past traditions or generations. Van Gennep stated three important characteristics; their threefold pattern, the liminal phase which could acquire a certain autonomy within the ceremonial whole and passage from one social position to another, identified with a territorial passage, for example the entrance to a house or village.

Van Gennep's ideas about rites of passage was later developed by Turner (1974, 1986, 1990), who looked closely at the middle liminal phase, which was of importance as a 'storehouse of ideas' (1990, 12). Turner was also interested in the place of ritual within wider social dramas (see figure 4). Turner emphasises the importance of seeing religious and legal institutions as dynamic parts of societies which are constantly 'flowing' (1974, 37). He saw rites of passage as a movement from structure where systems of rank office, organisation and hierarchy are used to order society, through anti-structure in the liminal state – which was characterised by egalitarian and undifferentiated social relations and back to structure. He was particularly interested in communitas – the communal bond which formed during the social levelling and shared experience of liminality (see figure 3).

Turnbull's work also uses Turner's models as a basis, and is based on their discussions before his death, starting from their shared conviction that understanding the liminal state is of major importance to understanding human society (1990, 50). Turnbull's work emphasises the importance of 'subjective experience in the field' and the issues with 'participant observation' which can be little more than 'childish roleplaying' by untrained researchers. Turnbull posits that theatre can provide researchers with the rigorous preparation and training they need for 'total involvement' of their whole being which is needed for full understanding of social processes. (1990, 50-51). This presents the archaeologist with a dilemma, because unlike an anthropologist, participant observation, of any kind, is not possible when looking at past societies. However, perhaps archaeologists can still benefit from an embodied approach.

Although these models or 'rites of passage' do seem to have broad applicability to many kinds of ritual, Lincoln (1991) warns that the focus of van Gennep and Turner on male initiation rituals has led to a gendered bias, and that women's experience of initiation did not fit easily into this pattern and was perhaps better expressed as enclosure, followed by metamorphosis or magnification and then emergence. Lincoln believes this model better illustrates the lack of communitas or bonding as women's initiation rituals tend to take place for a single individual rather than a communal group (see figure 3). Lincoln believes that the cosmos is transformed along with the initiand in these rituals, which are designed to allow women to better accept their socialised cultural roles, by giving them meaning. Although this might serve society better than the interests of women, because the rituals were involved not only in the construction of persons but also the categories and hierarchies into which they are organised. Therefore, disrupting these rituals or producing new ritual forms can be a creative and powerful form of resistance to these processes which victimise women, where this is possible.

When looking at funerals and grave visiting in garden cemeteries, this aspect must be considered, particularly the experience of widows, which would be markedly different from that of other participants, including widowers, and be sensitive to ways in which rituals for or by exceptional women might differ from the expected norms of 19th century society. Garwood (2011) highlights that scant attention has been paid to variation in rites of passage according to status group and cultural identity, except in terms of relationships between elite and commoner rituals (Bloch 1987), and that this should be rectified, especially with regard to gender (2011, 266). Another consideration is that in this period, funerals tended to emphasise rank and social order and thus the experience of communitas might be limited by this continued imposition of structure throughout much or all of the ritual.

Many theorists have compared ritual to theatre because both can be seen as performances. Schechner (1994, 6-16) explored the links between different types of performance, including ritual, and their basic shared qualities including special ordering of time, special places set aside to perform and special non-productive value attached to objects used in the performance. When deciding if a performance is ritual or theatre, context and function are important- whether the purpose is efficacy or entertainment, which fits with what Alexander stressed; rituals are 'enacting' not just 'acting' (1997, 134). Schechner reminds that the boundaries between these categories are not fixed and static, for example, there are some rituals for which efficacy is of prime importance (e.g. to prevent warfare) and some which lose some or most of their meaning and become more like a play over time. Whether a specific performance is ritual or theatre depends on where it is performed, by whom and under what circumstances (1994, 622). Turner believes that theatre is modelled not directly on ritual, but on the 'redressive action' phase of social dramas (see figure 4), and that rituals are one possible type of redressive action –themselves falling into two main types; 'therapeutic' rituals of affliction and 'prophylactic' rituals including life-crisis rituals (1990).

For Turner and Schechner social and stage dramas are both part of a dynamic system of interdependence where there is a mutual mirroring of life by art and art by life as part of a spiralling process because 'cosmology has always been destabilised and society has always had to make efforts, through both social and esthetic drama, to restabilise and produce cosmos' (Turner 1990, 10).

Turner believes that as societies become more complex the 'liminal' of ritual becomes 'liminoid experiences' as social drama encompasses 'innumerable types and genres of cultural performance' including theatre, with ritual as the dominant form in pre-industrial societies, replaced by theatre in industrial pre-electronic ones. Schechner argues that the relationship is more variable than this – with performance and social drama coexisting since at least the palaeolithic, with people gathering to perform at ceremonial centres and then dispersing, and that although the function of these performances cannot be known for sure, they would likely have served multiple purposes – not just ritual but also maintaining friendly relations between groups. Schechner's study of more recent periods shows this fluctuation between ritual and theatre, efficacy and entertainment, rising and falling (for example in Western theatre from 1600AD to 2000AD) suggesting that performance doesn't just mirror social change, it 'participates in the complex process that creates change' (1994, 628). In this view people aren't just 'susceptible' to rituals – they need the satisfaction only ritual performances can provide and that when Marx said 'religion is the opium of the people' it might be literally true (1994, 632).

Garwood (2011) looks at the way 'rites of passage' have been understood within archaeology and notes that many scholars focus too much on the 'liminal' phase as emphasised by Turner and therefore miss the importance of the entire threefold structure. He argues that archaeologists 'usually ignore the different characteristics and purposes of the rites at other stages of the ritual process' (2011, 264). This is remedied by paying attention to rites of passage as a journey and the fundamental importance of movement, both physical e.g., crossing boundaries, and also symbolic, to these rituals. Where in the journey an action takes place may greatly affect its meaning and so an attempt should be made to place each action, such as deposition of an artefact or a burial, within the wider context of the whole ritual. For example, in Western mortuary traditions, processional movement as part of rite of separation (e.g. to church or churchyard) tends to 'emphasise increasing formality and collectivity as the domain of the sacred is approached' but movement out of the churchyard back to the everyday world (reaggregation) tends to be informal (Garwood 2011, 265).

Directionality is also important to understanding architecture and spatial articulation of cultural meanings – for example there are studies which look at approaching Stonehenge or Avebury, but they do not consider moving away (Garwood 2011, 273). The difficulty for archaeologists, as ever, is that rites of passage are best understood as whole processes but not every stage may be equally discernible materially. Garwood stresses that archaeologists must still try to imagine the full structure of the rite of passage to contextualise and give meaning to the particular stage encountered in the evidence – both in terms of specific rites and wider cultural schemes, because without this interpretation of ritual practice seems insubstantial, evasive, or abstract (2011, 277). Garwood's model of the rites of passage is useful for thinking through these journeys, emphasising the importance of thresholds and the stage of the ritual process (see figure 5).

Another issue within archaeology is that because evidence of person-kinds are unlikely to enter the archaeological record unless deliberately buried as part of funerary ritual, there is a bias towards mortuary evidence. Often these funerary categories have been viewed as direct evidence of living social 'types' which can be 'read-off' as reflections of identities constituted during rites of passage while the person was alive (Garwood 2011, 268). This denies the particular processes and intentions of mortuary ritual (Parker Pearson 1999) All funerals are rites of passage in their own right, thus involving transformation of identity and states of being, a kind of initiation where the deceased is the person initiated. Burials don't fossilise status-identities from life but instead create new sacred identities that 'will be' or 'could have been' (Bloch and Parry 1982, Mizoguchi 2000, Garwood 2007, and 2011). In fact, many rituals focus on 'lost potentiality', and this can be emphasised over actuality. Garwood concludes that death rituals are a technology for creating persons that never were, 'sacred stereotypes that can properly inhabit the domain of the dead' (2011, 269). We must always bear this in mind when analysing the rituals which took place and the monuments raised to the dead in garden cemeteries. These monuments also become sites for other grave tending and other rituals in which the monument stands in for the deceased, as will be discussed below.

2.4 Monumentality and Memorials

Like ritual, a single simple definition for what a monument is not easy to find, because they can have many functions depending on the society which erects them. One way of looking at monuments is as objects which are materially experienced (using our visual and other senses) whilst also being a social symbol (Johnson 2004, 317). Whilst rituals enact change, the erection of monuments are sometimes seen as an attempt to prevent change or to deny that change has happened. Rowlands and Tilley remark on the existence of monuments and memorials 'as a means of fixing history' and making us 'believe in the permanence of identity' (2006, 500).

Monuments are an example of lieux de mémoires (sites of memory), places that represent consciously held ideas of the past (Nora 1989), projecting permanence onto the landscape and denying the reality of change (Lowenthal 1985). Monuments are therefore often built at times of upheaval, for example to cement a new identity after social change has occurred, and in this way resist memory as much as they create it (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 500). Nora (1989) believes that monuments are needed because history destroys capacity for 'real memories' and so we need to construct sites of memory instead. Monuments are therefore objects taken out of history and yet they stand for history, distancing the viewer from both the past and present, whilst belonging to neither (Maleuvre 1999, 39). Rowlands and Tilley discuss how monuments have their own sense of 'monumental time' which is 'constructed as an index of an unchanging value but does so only by losing touch with what is actually remembered' (2006, 500) and so for anything to deserve to be preserved suggests that it has already been forgotten (2006, 501).

Collective or public memory is not simply the accumulation of individual memories but is instead, all the activities which a group use to map their myths about their worlds on to a specific time and place, and to make a version of the past resonate with group members (Connerton 1989, 2006, Rowlands and Tilley 2006). This is always open to renegotiation and change, and the cultural arena is the domain where it is produced, using media, entertainment, public ceremonies, festivals and the cultural landscape (Till 1999, Rowlands and Tilley 2006). The practices of public memory become embedded in material culture, public architecture, archives, museums, and monuments, memory is therefore objectified and becomes an active agent- with the potential to be therapeutic (Hoskins 1998, Young 1993).

There is significant literature about how official urban landscapes of memory, which include public spaces, museums, memorials and monuments, have been used as stages or backdrops for framing myths of national identity (Johnson 2004, Till 1999, 254) and how civic compositions can be used to teach about national heritage and public responsibility, by using the urban landscape to embody power and memory (Boyer 1994, 321). Of particular interest to scholars and of relevance to this thesis are spaces designed and built in Europe and America between 1870 and 1914, as part of nation building. At this time, urban landscapes were used to create a sense of belonging and civic consciousness, embedded in the familiarity of everyday spaces where people lived and worked. Cultural practices such as laying wreaths at national memorials and festive parades along prescribed routes are used to naturalise collective memory and as templates for enacting normal, appropriate behaviour within the group (Till 1999, 254).

Ariès (1974) credits the rise of commemorative monuments and practices in 19th century Europe to the rise in commemoration of loved ones using gravestones, which led to a new personal awareness that lived experiences of the past could never be directly recalled. Ariès believed that this need for personal commemoration and longing for a past flowed into public acts of monumentalising heroic figures and events to galvanise the public realm. However, his own later research (1982), and that of other scholars including Etlin (1984a), Ben-Amos (2000) and Kselman (2003) suggests that this relationship may have been far more reciprocal, with early monumentalising projects like the Pantheon and transfer of French notables to Père Lachaise, inspiring demand for personal and family memorialisation, which then encouraged the continued use of monuments as a means of building national memory.

In 19th century Europe there were often disputes the monumental urban landscape (Johnson 1995) and dissident groups who disagreed fought to take over or to create alternatives which were territorially and social distinct (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 501). These disputes over 'who has the authority to create, define, interpret and represent collective pasts through the creation of place' (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 501) served to legitimise this as a strategy for framing identity (Kaplan 1994, Mitchell 1988). This means that when regimes change, and monuments become 'disgraced' and open to controversy or hostility, they are then open to neglect, symbolically and physically, or even destruction. This process can be rapid, as was seen with the toppling of monuments in post-socialist Eastern Europe, or more gradual, such as the erection of monuments to Irish nationalist figures like O'Connell and Parnell in Dublin alongside existing statues of Queen Victoria and other monarchs, which were later removed, thus completing the transformation of the urban memory space. It is the new elites who decide to preserve or remove these sites of memory, as they attempt to define their own positions within the new political hierarchy and gain prestige, legitimacy and influence (Forest and Johnson 2002). Rowlands and Tilley note that as a result of these strategies that after these periods of struggle identities crystalise again and become once more difficult to challenge (2006, 505).

Although it is tempting to use only these civic urban landscapes as a lens for understanding cemeteries and their monumentality, there are many other studies which can offer interesting perspectives. There are an enormous number and variety of monumental forms worldwide, but one area where archaeologists have been using innovative interpretative approaches are the Neolithic and Bronze Age monuments of the British Isles and Northwest Europe, which have been subject to a rich and varied discussion (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 506). There is also discussion of how monuments, like landscapes more broadly, might have different meaning and social relevance depending on who visited them, how and when leading to 'parallel versions of social reality constructed through different kinds of knowledge and informed by different concerns and interests' (Brück 2001, 663) being apparent in the way monuments are used, leading to messy or contradictory assemblages at sites.

One specific aspect of monumentality that scholars of the Neolithic and Bronze Age have explored, which is of relevance to this thesis, is the study of materiality of monuments. The shapes, texture, and colour, plus hardness or softness, roughness or smoothness of stone or other materials have been studied by a range of scholars (Jones and MacGregor 2002, Cummings 2002, Tilley 2004) as has the use of materials from local and distant sources. Materiality relates to the role of monuments in transforming human experience as you move around them, for instance linking monuments to local and distant landscapes via form and materials (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 506-507). This exploration of materiality is important when understanding monumentality in garden cemeteries too.

Another aspect which has been widely discussed for these monuments is their relationship to cosmologies, through form and patterns of construction, for example the motif of houses for the living and for the dead seen in the shared forms of homes and ceremonial monuments in the Neolithic and Bronze Age (e.g. circular enclosures and houses, barrows and longhouses; Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 509). More broadly, scholars recognise complex relationships between monumentality, time and memory – with monuments not passively reflecting social relations, but actively serving to produce these relations. This is seen in the high proportion of monuments which are modified, altered, or left unfinished – because they are part of a 'continual dialectic between persons, practices and material structures' (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 511). We can see this happening in cemeteries, with additions to, replacement of and destruction of individual monuments, as well as wider changes to layout and architecture.

Studies of funerary monuments in other time periods offers many useful avenues for analysis of gravestones in the 19th century. Petts (2003), writing about Early Medieval Wales, states that burial rites and memorials don't directly reflect the status of dead in society, that they 'don't subjectively remember an objective identity but help create a contextually specific identity' (Petts 2003, 195). He argues that the carved stones acted as a way for mortuary rites to transcend the moment of their performance, by making the act of commemoration material, 'crystalising into a physical form the dynamic act of remembrance'. These objects don't just help recall memories, but also reproduce social knowledge, so that although memory of a specific funeral is limited to those who attended it, the presence of the memorial provides 'knowledge about the dead individuals and the context of burial to those at a distance, both physical and chronological' (Petts 2003, 194). Hope (2003) talking about the meaning of Roman funerary monuments, notes that 'as with all memorials, it is subjective and partial and often reveals more about the creator than the subject'. In this way, although the basic function of a gravestone as a visual sign to indicate where human remains are interred, they actually become symbols which stand for the dead person 'guardians not only of physical remains, but chosen aspects of the identity of the deceased and also the survivors' (Hope 2003, 121).

Researchers have already used Medieval and Post-Medieval gravestones and cemeteries as a resource for study, and so these works must also be vital to this analysis of those found within the samples at Père Lachaise and Highgate. Tarlow (1999) draws on material evidence from gravestones, alongside literary and historical sources to examine the evolution of attitudes towards death and commemoration in the last 500 years from the Reformation to WWII, arguing that personal relationships, at least as much as power or status, are what are being represented or negotiated in death. Tarlow used a dataset of Orkney gravestones as the basis for this work, but it can be applied much more widely to funerary monuments as a method for investigating changing attitudes to death. Tarlow's work on emotions in archaeology (2000b, 2012) explores the difficulties which researchers have in accessing individual emotional states and responses in the past, but highlights how we can productively explore shared emotional meanings, values and codes when looking at how material things and places are involved in shaping and expressing emotion (Tarlow 2012, 169).

Rowlands and Tilley believe that there is still room for monumentality research in a number of significant directions, including building a better understanding of how people in the past viewed and understood monuments which were 'ancient' to them, and used them as a resource for constructing the future, and also the relationship between public/official discourses and private/personal ones and how these mediate each other (2006, 512). The work of authors such as Hope (2003) and Tarlow (1999, 2000a) do consider the role of gravestones as an attempt to 'preserve individual memory' (Hope 2003, 121) as opposed purely to their function as monuments to 'collective memory' and so this thesis will draw on these works to ensure both public and private discourses are considered equally. Mytum's work on 'artefact biographies' (2004b) for gravestones shows that monuments do not have a static function or meaning, and that both can shift over time. This is particularly true if the monument is used to commemorate multiple people, either from one nuclear family or even a wider dynastic use across generations. Who gets commemorated, when, how are they remembered and for how long are all part of the social life of the monument and can tell us about the agency of the bereaved. This is especially relevant for monuments to the 'significant' dead which might have multiple audiences and different social lives related to each.

2.5 Social identity and power

Discussions of social identity and power have been one of the ever-present threads throughout this chapter. Social identity and power are invested in the spaces a society inhabits, produced and reproduced through its rituals and defined by its monuments. Social identity is context specific and influences an individual's experience of space, the extent to which and the way in which they participate in rituals and their relationship to monuments. The way power is invested and the forms of social controls it is used to express are dependent on the society being studied.

Archaeologists have used mortuary evidence to study the structure of past societies, to make inferences about the type of social organisation and what roles or identities individuals had within this. This started with the work of Childe in the 1940s, who used evidence from mortuary contexts across Europe and beyond from the beginning of human history up until the advent of Christianity to explore what the size and richness of tombs might say about changes to society. He found that overall 'in every domain accessible to the archaeologist, with progress in civilisation a dwindling proportion of societies growing wealth has been devoted to the preparation of tombs and their furnishing.' (1945, 18). Childe also argued that at times of upheaval and social change, greater emphasis was placed on mortuary practices than at times of stability: 'in a stable society the grave goods tend to grow relatively and even absolutely poorer as time goes on' (1945, 17) with less of the real wealth or goods used in life deposited in the grave or consumed on the pyre and that 'Royal Tombs' of exceptional grandeur such as the Sutton Hoo ship burial were associated with 'transitional stages' when societal change was occurring (1945, 19).

Mortuary evidence was also used to study past social structure in the early 1970s by Processual Archaeologists, most notably Binford, Saxe and Tainter, among others. These works used role theory to tie mortuary evidence to the social roles or personas which the deceased inhabited in life, which can then be used to study the structure of the society from which they originate.

Binford (1971) proposed that there was a relationship between the social rank of the deceased and the number of people with relationships to them, and that the facets of social persona of the deceased (a composition of social identities maintained in life, appropriate for consideration in death) recognised in funerary rituals. These would vary directly with relative rank of social position in life. Binford's study looked at a number of dimensions of social persona: age, sex, social position, conditions of death (how death occurred), location of death, and social affiliation (e.g. membership of clan) and found that recognition of these dimensions differed between settled farmers and other types of society, and that the number of dimensions also differed with hunter-gatherers tending to employ fewer dimensions than settled farmers. This indicated that more complex societies had more complex funerary rituals and some social persona dimensions were associated with certain kinds of funerary treatment e.g. grave orientation, grave goods. As summarised by Parker Pearson, 'who you are affects how you get buried and the separate bits that make up your identity get represented in different ways' (1999, 29).

Saxe (1970) devised a set of eight hypotheses which link social complexity with mortuary practices, which he tested against ethnographic data from three societies. Saxes argued that components of disposal of the dead 'cooperate in a partitioning of the universe' and represent social personae which are congruent with wider social organisation. He also argued that the social significance of the deceased would affect the way they were treated, and that for people of greater social significance, the social personae represented in death would be those which represented their higher position and the expense of their less socially significant identities.

Tainter (1978) also developed Saxe's work by using the idea of energy expenditure to explore the relationship between social status and differential treatment of the dead. This study was based on ethnographic analysis of 103 societies and took into consideration many different aspects of funerary practice including complexity of body treatment, construction and placement of grave or tomb, extent and duration of mortuary ritual, material contributions to the ritual and human sacrifice (if present). Tainter found that in 90% of cases there was a correlation between the social status of a person and the degree of energy expenditure in their mortuary rites (1978, 121).

Parker Pearson (1982, 1999) approached the archaeology of death from a theoretical position that 'considers power as central to the study of social systems' (1982, 100), with an understanding of social relations which focuses on 'relations of dominance and influence' between groups. Ideology which serves the interests of the dominant group is used to legitimise systems of dominance. However, post-processual scholars like Parker Pearson stress that traces of mortuary practices in archaeological contexts are not direct reflections of the deceased in life, but are actively created in death by these practices– 'the dead do not bury themselves but are treated and disposed of by the living' (Parker Pearson 1999, 3) and thus we need to understand the reflexive relationship between society and the way the deceased are commemorated. Parker Pearson's work used the cemeteries of Cambridge in the 1970s to explore variation in funerary practice between classes, religious denominations (e.g. Catholic, Muslim, Jewish) and ethnic groups (e.g. Polish, Gypsies/Travellers) using data from monumentality, cemetery layout and funeral directors records e.g. cost of funeral, choice of coffin fittings (Parker Pearson 1982, 101-105). This approach combining what is visible in the cemetery with documentary research helps include aspects of funerary practice which are invisible archaeologically or which cannot be otherwise be seen without excavation.

Sociologists like Marx and Durkheim help us with our understanding of society in Europe in the long 19th century, because although their theories can, and have been, widely applied to other time periods and places, they were first and foremost writing about the society in which they lived. For this thesis this is especially true of Marx, who is buried in Highgate cemetery and was responsible for the funeral of his wife Jenny when she was buried there a few years before his own demise.

Karl Marx saw 'inequality and power as explicitly formulated as a function of economic relations' and that social relations change over time with different forms of inequality and dominance, 'broadly defined by Marx as the control of one group over the production and reproduction of another, occurring within and decisively shaped by forms of property' (Babić 2005, 68). The industrial revolution created new forms of inequality where the bourgeoisie had control over the means of production (e.g. factories) and therefore controlled the labour of the proletariat. Cemeteries in this era can be seen as a clear expression of the class struggle and it is not hard to imagine some of the criticisms which Marx would have had about the funerary practices he saw at Highgate. Marxist theories are also still being applied to the study of cemeteries, for example by Lull (2000) who views burial sites as 'deposits of social labour'. He argues that 'funerary practices, offerings and rituals, denote the material conditions of the society and provide information on the forms taken by it' (2000, 579), and that the study of death cannot be independent of the study of the living, because use of social labour on the dead will correlate to the community's economic capacity.

Emile Durkheim was also interested in the instruments used by society to gain power over the individual. He developed the idea of 'collective consciousness' describing the shared feelings and beliefs which give order to the world in a society, which are best expressed through rituals 'as conscious expressions of togetherness, authority and power rooted in the collective' (Babić 2005, 68). Durkheim was concerned with understanding how social solidarity and integration were preserved, especially in a rapidly changing society which was becoming more diverse and less religious, like the one in which he lived (Allan 2014, 109). Durkheim considered cemeteries to be material forms of 'collective representations' where the bereaved don't remember their dead privately, but publicly and visibly, and argued that "mourning is not a natural movement of private feeling wounded by a cruel loss; it is a duty imposed by the group" (1995, 400, cited in Vanderstraeten 2009). Therefore, we can use the cemeteries of Highgate and Père Lachaise to explore the collective consciousness of society in London and Paris at the time when they were created.

2.6 Summary

The study of cemeteries relies on an understanding of the reciprocal relationships between society and funerary practices, which are manifested through the design of spaces, the rituals which take place in them, the kinds of monuments erected and the social identities of the dead which are expressed in them. This thesis will draw on theoretical frameworks from all of these aspects in order to look at Highgate and Père Lachaise not as simple mirrors of society, but also arenas where funerary practice was one of the active and dynamic forces used to express and influence wider social change. Chapter three will examine the cultural context in which garden cemeteries were created in Britain and France during the early part of the 19th century and how changes over time affected them.

Chapter Three - Garden cemeteries in Britain and France

3.1 Introduction

Garden cemeteries, an entirely new form of sacred landscape, emerge in France and spread across Europe and beyond in the first half of the 18th century. This chapter will explore why they were needed and how they developed, telling the stories of the original garden cemetery Père Lachaise, and its London counterpart Highgate Cemetery.

3.2 Urbanisation and the associated burial crisis in NW European industrial states during the 18th and 19th centuries

Europe in the mid-18th century was entering a time of rapid development, with countries exploiting the wealth and resources gathered from their empires to fuel growth at home and European society rapidly transformed by a succession of technological and social changes. The industrial revolution created new jobs and opportunities in cities, whilst at the same time reducing the number of agricultural labourers needed in rural communities. Urban populations exploded and cities struggled to cope, leading to issues with housing, infrastructure and sanitation as population growth and density increased (Young 1961). Unfortunately, the number of people dying in cities increased at a corresponding rate, and existing burial grounds were quickly overwhelmed.

For over 1000 years, the majority of burials had taken place in parish churchyards, with graves being reused every generation or so. Graves were usually unmarked, with memorials reserved for the elite who preferred interment inside the church, as close to the saints as money and status would allow (Ariès 1981). Small, locally made gravestones did exist from the late 17th century onwards, but did not become common until well into the 19th century (Tarlow 1999). This model was not however practical in the newly growing cities, instead of filling the available space in 40-50 years (Mytum 2000), many became full within 4-5 years, leading to rapid reuse and some very unpleasant consequences (Etlin 1984a).

Soil levels around churches rose as more bodies were packed into the space, not only through mass of burial alone, but sometimes with soil deliberately added to allow more burials as was seen in York (Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow 2012, 93). In 1780, William Hutton remarked that ‘instead of the church burying the dead, the dead would have in time buried the church’ when writing about St Martins, the original Paris church in Birmingham (McKenna 1992, 7). As the new centre of England's industrial heartland, Birmingham experienced a population increase of over 50,000 people in the years between 1700 and 1801, from an initial population of 5,000-7,000 people and the most rapid increase occurring after 1750 (Adams 2006, 7). Churchyard extensions were opened in many cities, either adjoining the church where this was possible, or often as a separate plot nearby, as happened with St Martin's in Birmingham which opened an additional ground on Park Street (McKenna 1992, 11). This was especially common in London, where there were many small churchyards which Dickens described as ‘sometimes so entirely detached from churches, always pressed upon by houses; so small, so rank, so forgotten' (Dickens 1958; 234). These extensions were insufficient however and by the beginning of the 19th century most were also in an appalling state (McKenna 1992; 11).

In Paris, the situation was especially bad at Les Innocents, a burial ground named after the Holy Innocents slaughtered by Herod, in the district of Les Halles (Jones 2004; 15), which served eighteen parishes, two hospitals and the city morgue (Etlin 1984a; 10) and had been in use for over a thousand years (Etlin 1984a; 13). Les Innocents was surrounded by charniers, arcades of private chapels with burial vaults below which had been us use since the late 14th-early 15th century and were reserved for the wealthy. The rest of the cemetery was largely given over to mass graves, each holding around 600 bodies, although an area close to le petit charnier was reserved for single graves, while the area furthest from the church was reserved for charity burials and thus ''through hierarchy of places for burial, presented a visual class portrait'' (Etlin 1984a; 10).

All graves were periodically reused and the bones were piled up and displayed in the attics of the charniers and church, but despite this by the late 17th century the soil was exhausted, and the situation further deteriorated into the 18th century, not helped by the dumping of rubbish from the neighbouring market, and human waste by residents in the adjacent streets into the cemetery. Public health concerns had been raised about Les Innocents as early as 1711, and there had been many calls to close the cemetery. Closure was finally order in September 1780, after a release of ‘mephitic gas’ from a communal grave into the cellars of houses on Rue de la Lingerie between February and June, which made several people severely ill. The emissions were finally controlled by use of quicklime as a disinfectant and fires to aid ventilation (Etlin 1984a; 33).

The dead buried at Les Innocents were exhumed and transferred to former limestone quarries beneath Paris, and the area was turned into an herb and vegetable market, but initially no new cemeteries were opened to replace it, instead the dead from parishes formerly served by Les Innocents were accommodated at other cemeteries. This pattern which was repeated elsewhere and cemeteries in outer parishes began to experience overcrowding too as those in inner parishes closed, merely shifting the problem and clearly not providing a viable solution. A new, long-term plan was needed, with new cemeteries outside the city where they couldn’t pose a risk to health via ‘contaminated air’ (Etlin 1984a).

3.3 The first garden cemetery; Père Lachaise, Paris

From the 1740s until the opening of Père Lachaise in 1804, various ideas about what a cemetery should look like and what functions it should perform were proposed. 'The image of a cemetery changed distinctly…as it passed from traditional charnel house to what was called an Elysium or Field of Rest' (Etlin 1984a; 39). The period 1780 to 1804 was a turbulent one for the dead of Paris, characterised by rapidly changing attitudes not seen before or since (Ariès 1981), and the transformations of the cemetery are due to a variety social, cultural and religious changes, and their interaction with architectural and landscape design, and commemorative gestures.

3.3.1 Precursors and influences

After the closure of the overcrowded city churchyards like Les Innocents in 1785, the vast majority of Parisian dead had been forced to make long journeys to their rest, with the funeral service usually ending at the church with the body then transferred to a repository and later continuing to the grave unaccompanied. There was no provision for private graves within these burial grounds and the conditions were generally very poor – with common pits every bit as bad as the ones they were supposed to have replaced. Various models for improvements were suggested but none were realised. Initially the rich could escape burial in the anonymous public cemetery by paying endowments for burial in a church vault, an option which was removed by the French Revolution (Ariès 1981, 495-503).

After 1789, the revolutionary ideal was for liberté, égalité, fraternité not just in life, but also in death. Each parish was assigned one common grave within the public cemetery, where everyone regardless of status would lie. This was essentially an extension of the existing situation for the poor. Bodies were transported at night and buried without religious ceremony and often without family present. The conduct of the porters also received heavy criticism, they were disrespectful and often seen to be drunk in the line of duty, in some cases it was necessary to assemble a large party to accompany the porters to ensure respectable conduct. The Thermadorian convention addressed this issue by suggesting that all funeral processions be accompanied by a public official such as a magistrate or local commissioner (Ariès 1981: 504-5). Gradually the indifference and disrespect to the dead were viewed with increasing criticism- these practices left the bereaved with little chance to grieve, and no clear final resting place to visit, even if one was brave enough to attempt to do so. Some practices, such as the use of repositories for bodies were therefore discontinued and many designs were suggested for improving cemeteries, although the name champs de repos, 'fields of rest' was favoured – as it evoked the image of death as sleep and did not have the same unpleasant associations as cimetière did at that time. There was much disagreement about the best way to evoke respect for the dead without introducing religious elements.

Some designs suggested between the 1780s and 1800 differed little from the churchyards of old, with charniers and mural monuments, but with trees and planting to evoke a garden feel, others suggested that no monuments at all should be allowed or not even trees which might interfere with airflow. Others suggested that low mounds would be sufficient to mark the location of a loved ones grave and some suggested that monuments should be allowed, but only for those who embodied the ideals of the revolution, to act as inspiration to mourners (Ariès 1981, 507-510), in the same way that from 1790, the Panthéon would be the resting place of national heroes with its motto 'AUX GRANDS HOMMES LA PATRIE RECONNAISSANTE'; 'to great men, the grateful homeland' (Centre des Monuments Nationaux 2015).

The Decree of 23 Prairial, Year XII (1804) would finally set in stone the rules for new cemeteries. The decree confirmed the prohibition against burial in towns, stating that all cemeteries must be at least forty yards beyond urban limits. It also forbade the superposition of bodies, although this was eventually reconsidered in the case of the poor, initially they were to be buried side by side in long trenches, but each would be placed in a separate coffin, and for all other classes of burial, private graves would be used. No grave should be reopened until 5 years had passed, and therefore the area of the cemetery should be five times the size needed to contain the estimated number bodies buried in one year. Trees and shrubs were to be planted, provided that they did not interfere with the circulation of the air, and where there would be the opportunity to erect monuments to the dead. However there grant to build a tomb was to be dependent on space being available and be reserved for those who made a donation to the poor and the hospitals. These were envisioned as a rarity similar to how pious endowments in return for the erection of monuments in churches had operated in the past (Ariès 1981: 516-17). Nicholas Frochot, Prefect of the Seine, was tasked with creating four cemeteries at the cardinal points outside the city limits, beginning with la cimetière de l'est, the ‘cemetery of the east’.

3.3.2 Design and creation

La cimetière de l'est was constructed first, because it was to designated as the elite cemetery, which provided sufficient space for those who were granted the right to raise a monument (Ariès 1981: 517). This cemetery would come to be known as Père Lachaise, after Père Francois de la Chaise who had lived in the Jesuit house known as Mont-Louis on this site and been confessor to Louis XIV. The house may have taken its name from the patron saint of Jesuits or been renamed in honour of the King (Etlin 1984a: 303).

Etlin states that ‘On the one hand, the opening of Père Lachaise signalled the victory of a 60-year-old French reform movement to banish burials from the heart of the city. At the same time, this cemetery was the first garden cemetery to be realized after two decades of French proposals for this type of burial ground.’ (1984b, 211)

The design of the new cemetery was a complete contrast to Les Innocents. Instead of a bare landscape with an encircling gallery the design was instead inspired by romantic ideals to create a garden landscape where the dead could sleep eternally in an Elysian field. Influence came from the graveyard poets, such as Young with his descriptions of the comfort of beholding the tomb amid an Arcadian idyll. English gardens of the Romantic movement provided a blueprint with their natural beauty and scattered memorials - whether real tombs for friends and family, or cleverly designed follies designed to act as mnemonics either for specific people including historical figures or virtuous concepts such as truth, beauty or science more widely. These English gardens ‘acknowledged or accommodated death’ (J. D. H 1984, 209) with monuments being as much an integral part of the so-called 'picturesque' garden as is the 'informal' path or the carefully contrived 'natural' clump of trees on a hill (Curl 1984, 226). Architectural historians such as Etlin (1984a, 1984b) and Curl (1984, 2000, 2001a, 2002) site a number of key examples including Pope’s obelisk in memory of his mother at Twickenham, Shenstone’s elegiac tribute to a pantheon of dead poets at Leasowes, the family mausoleum at Castle Howard set in Elysian fields, plus the Temple of Ancient Virtue and Temple of British Worthies at Stowe and of course Ermenonville (see 4.2.2). The images conjured by these gardens ‘would have such a powerful hold on the imagination of continental observers who would soon propose the landscape garden as a model for the new cemetery.’ (Etlin 1984b, 217).

In this ‘garden cemetery’ we can see a reaction to not only the practices of the ancien régime but also the post-revolutionary ‘abandonment’ of the dead. It embodies ideas which had been formulating about burial; that cemeteries should be places where loved ones could be mourned, where nature would provide comfort and where monuments could serve as inspiration for moral reflection.

Frochot chose Alexandre-Théodore Brongniart as the architect and designer for Père Lachaise, Brongniart was a respected architect and prominent member of Parisian society and his previous work included numerous projects in the city, both public and private, including the garden of the Hôtel de Monaco, which included some features inspired by English gardens he would employ again in his designs for Père Lachaise. Broginart's plans for the cemetery included allées, winding pathways, varied planting and sunken bosquets where clusters of tombs could be formed amid seemingly natural clearings. The chapel which would be built to replace the Jesuit house at the top of the hill, would be shaped like a pyramid, (Etlin 1984a) as can be seen in Figure 6, tapping into a new awareness of Egyptian culture which came from Napoleonic expeditions to Egypt. The public now associated all things Egyptian with death and for Napoleon this pyramid would serve as yet another monument to his achievements (Brown 1973). When designing the pyramid Brongniart was inspired by the 'architecture parlante' tradition of Boullée, in which architecture could speak of the awe, terror, and sublime horrors of death, so the architecture and landscape expressed their function.' (Curl 1984, 237)

Before the cemetery opened in 1804, 113 tombstones which had been recovered from the abandoned cemeteries of Paris (Ariès 1981: 518) were laid throughout the landscape, creating the desired appearance of monuments within a garden. Brongniart designed several of the first memorials to be created specifically for Père Lachaise including the Greffulhe Mausoleum in 1810, which has a prominent place on top of the hill and served as a centre-piece to the cemetery until construction of the chapel was complete (Keister 2013: 52).

In 1807 Brongniart was also asked by Napoleon to supervise the completion of the Paris Stock Exchange. Sadly, he died in 1813, before either the cemetery or stock exchange were complete (Keister 2013: 20). After his death, work on Père Lachaise was taken over by Erienne-Hippolyte Godde, who had his own vision for Père Lachaise. Godde designed the monumental entrance gates to the cemetery on boulevard de Ménilmontant, and after the demolition of the Jesuit house in 1820, erected a classical revival style chapel there in 1823, rather than the pyramid which Brongniart had envisaged (Etlin 1984a: 328) as can be seen in figure 7.

3.3.3 Initial problems and a prestigious solution

In the first year after opening Père Lachaise saw only 13 burials (Keister 2013: 7), despite the obvious need for a new burial ground, and although numbers did slowly improve over the next decade or so, with 509 monuments constructed in 1814, more than the total for the previous 10 years (Ariès 1981: 518), the cemetery was by no means an instant success. The reluctance of Parisians to be buried in the new cimetière de l'est, can be attributed to two main issues. Firstly, the distance from the city was off-putting for many Parisians, despite the fact that an extra-mural location had been chosen deliberately to improve conditions. Secondly, Père Lachaise was unconsecrated land, as befitted a secular state-run cemetery, and this was unacceptable to many Catholics (Keister 2013).

However, Frochot had an ingenious idea which would transform the appeal of Père Lachaise virtually overnight. He brokered a deal which allowed the transfer of four prestigious residents to the cemetery. In 1817, La Fontaine, Molière, Héloïse and Abelard were moved to the cemetery and monuments were erected to them there, attracting many visitors (Keister 2013: 7). Frochot's deal was essentially a trade, he was allowed to move these icons to Père Lachaise, in exchange for the coffined remains of Louise de Lorraine (Henri III's queen) which had been found during the demolition of the Capucine Convent at Vendome in 1806 (Brown 1973, 20-21). Frochot had acquired the coffin and transported it to Père Lachaise, but now gave it to Louis XIII for burial at Saint-Denis which he did with all the pomp and ceremony befitting a queen (Keister 2013: 58). This was not the last time that Père Lachaise would be embroiled in a politically charged funeral, but the cemetery would later take a much more central role in such occasions (Ben-Amos 2000).

The monuments to La Fontaine and Molière are placed side by side with both plots enclosed within the same railings, so that the author and the playwright who were friends in life can lie together in death (Keister 2013: 63). For Héloïse and Abelard, the posthumous reunion was one which wasn't possible in life, for these ill-fated lovers were doomed to spend most of their lives apart as monk and nun, communicating only through letters. Their monument which has the appearance of a small chapel was designed by Alexander Lenoir and incorporates stones from the ruins of the Oratory of the Paraclete where Héloïse was Mother Superior (Keister 2013: 56-58).

Quickly Père Lachaise was seen as a desirable final address, with around 30,000 burials by 1823. Although the vast majority were buried in common graves (82%), with 13% purchasing a temporary concession, and only 5% purchasing a plot in perpetuity, the landscape was still dotted with monuments as almost half of these graves were marked, even if the memorials were temporary (Keister 2013: 8). Over time the number of perpetual concessions grew, and would eventually see a complete transformation of the garden landscape (Worpole 2003).

3.3.4 Popularity and influence

Brongniart had utilised many of the features from the Jesuit garden to his advantage when creating the cemetery, to create a series of grand vistas but also more secluded spaces, allowing each choosing person choosing a plot ‘to find a property to his taste. Some chose the heights, others flatland, some built their family mausolea along avenues for all to see, others sought privacy in thickets and in bowers’ (Brown 1973; 26). Many were drawn not just to the cemetery as a whole for its prestige, but over time specific locations became fashionable or desirable to those wishing to sleep beside kindred spirits, such as the rendezvous des braves where soldiers joined the ranks beside Napoleonic generals (Etlin 1984a).

The popularity of Père Lachaise grew not only as a place to spend eternity, but also as a place to spend a day out, becoming something of a tourist attraction. At the end of the Napoleonic wars in 1815, British visitors returned to France, and over the next few years a visit to the cemetery became a staple part of any trip to the French capital (Curl 2000). Père Lachaise gripped the imagination of not just the French and British, but also many other international visitors, who turned to the garden cemetery model as a solution to their own burial crises. Etlin sees the influence of Père Lachaise everywhere and suggests it became 'inconceivable to fashion a cemetery which was not in some way analogous' (1984a: ix), this thesis will examine the extent of this influence, and whether it runs deeper than initial inspiration.

Even as Père Lachaise was lauded and imitated in garden cemeteries across Britain, and rural cemeteries across the Atlantic (Linden- Ward 1989), domestic popularity was quickly erasing the garden aspect of the landscape. When visiting Père Lachaise today, it has the appearance of a 'city of the dead', full of cobbled streets lined by mausolea and very little vegetation (Worpole 2003). The once lauded views across Paris, which feature in many illustrations (see Figure 8), are now largely obscured, and Brown speculates that by as early as 1850 it would have been difficult to observe 'the city through row behind row of bourgeois manses, overarched by limes and chestnut trees.' (1973; 27). Although the cemetery did contain public graves for the poor which were subject to reuse after 6 years, and many private graves were purchased as temporary concessions with renewable leases of five years (Etlin 1984a: 310), the number of concessions à perpetuité grew over time and the majority of the leased graves would also be marked in some way, perhaps following the same logic as Browne over 200 years before; 'Gravestones tell truth scarce fourty years' (1658, 76) that their memorial would last as long as the memory of them prompted descendants to renew the lease. Even public graves might be marked as 'temporary memorials would be permitted here so long as they did not hinder the prescribed exhumations' (Etlin 1984a: 310).

3.3.5 Expansion and new burial crises

Grave re-use in the public cemetery and where leases had lapsed alone would not satisfy demand for burial at Père Lachaise and so the cemetery was extended several times, first in 1824, then again in 1829, 1832 and 1842. In 1850 an area of land to the north was purchased, doubling the size of the cemetery. This new extension, separated from the older part of cemetery by a 200-year-old avenue of Chestnut trees, is of a completely different character. Brown describes the contrast faced by visitors who 'having found one's way through the old cemetery's labyrinthine streets, one suddenly encounters a flat almost treeless grid.' (1973: 30). In this extension, which was laid out after 1855, gone is the romantic, meandering garden, replaced by straight lines and open vistas, a change which mirrored the transformation of Paris by Haussmann in 1853.

In 1856, Napoleon III granted one square of this new block to the Turkish government, as part of his pact with them. This allowed them to build a mosque there and bury their dead (Brown 1973: 31), however in practice there was little demand for these graves. In 1887 the crematorium was constructed (Brown 1973: 37), although it would be 2 years before the first 'voluntary' cremation took place there. The original purpose of the crematorium was to replace the small incinerator which had been used since the inception of Père Lachaise (Ameskamp 2006: 35) for the disposal of medical waste, and unclaimed bodies from the hospitals. However, the Senate also ratified a bill which allowed an individual or family to request cremation, which after the 1st instance on 30th January 1889, took place another 48 times that year (Keister 2013: 31), but it would be 50 years before the columbarium niches would become a popular final resting place (Brown 1973: 37).

If cremation had been more widely accepted, it would have solved a major issue facing the cemetery in the latter part of the century. As the number of perpetual concessions and the popularity of monuments grew, cemeteries like Père Lachaise and its counterparts to the North and South; Montmartre and Montparnasse began to run out of space, despite the huge extension to Père Lachaise. Another issue was the expansion of Paris, as the annexing of the suburbs brought all 3 cemeteries within the city limits once again in 1859. This raised questions given the previous restrictions on, and supposed dangers of, intramural burial (Ariès 1981: 539).

Haussmann suggested a repeat of the Les Innocents solution, with Père Lachaise and the other cemeteries closed and replaced by a cemetery 19 miles beyond the city limits at Méry-sur-Oise, a site where the sandy soil was deemed excellent for the rapid dissolution of bodies. Due to the distance from the city, a special railway would be laid to take funeral trains to the new cemetery (Brown 1973, 33). However, in the 80 years since the clearance of Les Innocents, attitudes towards the dead had changed completely and the ability to visit the cemetery and spend time with lost loved ones was now an essential feature of French burial practice, which some scholars, like Ariès have described as a 'cult of the dead' (1981: 534).

Support for this 'cult of the dead' could be found at all levels of Parisian society, and the administration was forced to give up its plans when they realised they did not have the support of the educated elite (Ariès 1981: 540). Surprisingly there was also criticism from the Catholic church. In contrast to the church's relative ambivalence towards the individual dead in the churchyards of old, Catholic practice now fully embraced the new cemeteries and praised care of the dead as a Christian virtue, and worried that filial piety to the dead would suffer if the cemetery was so far removed from the city (Ariès 1981: 546).

The 3rd republic raised the issue again in 1881 (Brown 1973), but scientific evidence, which had been building since 1850 seemed to conclusively prove that cemeteries did not pose a risk to public health (Ariès 1981: 540) and so the issue was dropped. Experiments had showed no danger to air or water from properly maintained burial grounds due to the 'marvelous purifying power possessed by the earth' (Chardouillet 1881).

At Père Lachaise the issue which addressed in the short-term by a decree issued in 1874 by the Paris Municipal Council, which outlawed temporary leases and common graves there (Brown 1973: 37). This essentially made the cemetery off limits to all but the richest Parisians, increasing the amount of space available for permanent graves was beneficial to begin with, but over time only exacerbated the issue.

The 20th century saw the reintroduction of temporary concessions, with leases of 10, 30 or 50 years. Also 'permanent' residents face eviction if their monuments don't meet the required standard of maintenance, and those which become unsightly or hazardous are served with four year notices for repairs to be completed or face removal, freeing up valuable real estate and allowing burial to continue in older parts of the cemetery (although at a much slower rate) even today (Keister 2013; XI).

The Monument aux Morts at the end of the Avenue Principale (see figure 9), was designed by Paul-Albert Bartholmé after the death of his wife in 1881, he crafted a model of the sculpture between 1891 and 1895, before being commissioned by the City of Paris to create the full-sized version which was unveiled on All Saints Day 1899. Between 1920 and 1940 there were several decrees relating to the eventual fate of bones removed from abandoned or dilapidated perpetual concessions in 16 Paris cemeteries. An ossuary was required, and Monument aux Morts presented designer Jules Formigé with an ideal solution. The two doors either side of the monument now lead into the ossuary built into the hill behind, and the first bones were received there in 1953, from Montmartre and Montparnasse, with bones from Père Lachaise added from 1963 (Keister 2013: 12-13).

3.4 Garden cemeteries in the British Isles

The success of Père Lachaise was soon inspiring cemeteries in other countries, across France, Europe and North America. The British, who flocked to visit Paris after the end of the Napoleonic wars, were quick to take the garden cemetery model and put their own unique spin on it as the example of Père Lachaise reinvigorated calls for non-churchyard burial solutions in Britian.

Separate burial grounds were already increasing in number in Scotland and Northern Ireland, such as Calton Burial Ground at Edinburgh which opened in the mid 18th century at Clifton Street in Belfast (1774 (Curl 1984, 224-225) and were part of a movement to distance burial from church control and stamp out 'Papist' prayers for the dead (Curl 2001a, 14).

In London, calls for extra-mural burials can be traced back at least to 1665 with Christopher Wren and John Evelyn. They campaigned for a cemetery outside London after the Plague and Great Fire, inspired by the Appian Way in Rome (Curl 1984, 224). Although the motivations of Evelyn and Wren were primarily practical, the conversion of Bunhill Fields which had once been used for the disposal of excess bones from London churchyards, into a burial ground was also religious. Founded by Non-conformists (also known as Dissenters- Protestant Christians who do not adhere to the doctrine of the Church of England such as Baptists and Unitarians) looking for religious freedom in death, something which would become increasingly important in the 19th century.

3.4.1 The first British garden cemeteries; 1820s-1830s

At this time there was a growing number of Non-conformists and unless their chapel or community had its own burial ground or crypt, which was rare, Dissenters had no option but to be buried in the parish churchyard. This not only involved burial in consecrated ground and paying a fee to the Anglican church, but also restricted the rites which could be performed. Most parishes required all services to be performed by the Parish priest, following the book of common prayer (Curl 2000).

The founding of a cemetery represented freedom, and many wealthy businessmen in cities like Liverpool and Birmingham were non-conformist, so they founded joint stock companies and built their own cemeteries on the model of Père Lachaise. This began with St James in Liverpool in 1825 and was swiftly followed by many other in the 1830s, such as Glasgow Necropolis in 1833 which was owned by the Merchant's House (Scott 2005) and Key Hill in Birmingham in 1836 (McKenna 1992). These cemeteries often had both consecrated and unconsecrated ground, and chapels for both Anglican and non-conformist services. Some, including Glasgow also set aside areas for the burial of Catholics or members of the Jewish faith (Scott 2005).

Between 1832 and 1847 Parliament authorized the establishment of eight commercial cemetery companies in the London area (Curl 1984, 229) due to the enormous challenges of supplying the city with sufficient and suitable burial space. The first of these, Kensal Green (1833) would have likely been created almost a decade earlier had the campaigns of George Frederick Carden to form a cemetery on the model of Père Lachaise (which he visited in 1821) from 1824 onwards not been put on hold in 1825 due to an unfavourable economic climate (Richardson and Curl 2001, 22-23).

Many joint stock cemeteries were a financial success, bringing in revenue for shareholders from burial fees (Curl 2000), and also in some cases from secondary income as well. Key Hill Cemetery in Birmingham was built on a former quarry site, and so sand which could be used in the local industries for metal casting was sold and the cemetery expanded in the process (McKenna 1992). However, these speculative ventures were not a guaranteed or overnight success, as demonstrated by the rocky start at Kensal Green Cemetery (Curl 2001c-d). The insistence of the shareholders at Brompton on a buy out as soon as the short-lived Metropolitan Internments Act (1850) made this possible, even when the government balked at the costs associated with the acquisition (Curl 2001d, 125-6) demonstrate the worries about the sustainability of this model, with the Board of Health considering that to date only Kensal Green was a commercial success. London Cemetery Company also tried to sell Nunhead Cemetery, Highgate's sister cemetery at this time, but were unsuccessful (Curl 2001d, 126). However, once the threat of closure or acquisition by the government was removed, these cemeteries did rebound in popularity and most had a long period of relative commercial success.

3.4.2 Burial Acts

The new cemeteries were clean, spacious and beautiful, very far removed from the fetid conditions of inner-city churchyards. They were also profit-seeking, aimed at those who could afford to pay for a private grave and a memorial, and had no obligation to bury the poor, a duty which still fell to the parish. Therefore, they did little to relieve the overall burden of parish churchyards, and conditions did not improve (Curl 2000). Cemeteries remained very much a public health issue, with reports by Walker (1839) and especially Edwin Chadwick (1843) which highlighted the dangers. From 1852 burial was finally outlawed in central London, and between 1852 and 1857 a workable system of inexpensive public burial was finally implemented for the city (Curl 2001d, 126).

The Burial Acts of 1850, 1852 and 1853 were passed by Parliament which took burial out of the private market and allowed vestries to lay out new cemeteries by using loans raised against the rates. The legislation stated that these new cemeteries were to be half consecrated and half unconsecrated, in order to reflect equity of burial between the Church of England and other Protestant denominations (Rugg 2014: 113), although in practice, burial remained an area of religious contention throughout the 19th century, because the Acts (further burial acts were passed between 1855-1885) effectively safeguarded the income which the Church of England gained from burial fees (Rugg 2014: 130).

3.4.3 Municipal cemeteries

Many people had been uncomfortable that cemeteries were being run for profit by joint stock companies, as if the dead were a commodity like railways, and so municipal cemeteries run by a local burial board to meet the needs of residents were seen as an ideal solution, even if in practice some disputes between Anglicans and nonconformists remained.

The landscape of the garden cemetery was an inspiration for the burial boards when they came to lay out cemeteries of their own, but they were also influenced by the writing of John Claudius Loudon, whose book ‘On the Laying Out, Planting, and Managing of Cemeteries, and on the Improvement of Churchyards’ (1843) took a slightly different approach. His plans for cemeteries were more formal than those inspired by the winding pathways and natural planting of a garden. He suggested a grid layout to maximise burial space, and believed that trees should be planted sparingly so that air could circulate freely through the cemetery and avoid a build-up of 'bad air', the prevailing theory for the transmission of disease at the time. He suggested that trees and special memorials could form focal points at the intersection points of the grid, and that markers on the cemetery walls could improve navigation (Loudon 1843).

The grid layout was adopted by many municipal cemeteries, who after all needed to be economical with land set aside for burial, and was also often seen in extensions and reworking of layout in earlier garden cemeteries, such as at Père Lachaise. Loudon's cautions about planting however were less strictly followed and many of the early municipal cemeteries continued to plant groves of trees, shrubs and flowerbeds to create a natural feel, and some pathways, such as the main carriage drive to the chapel might take a more circuitous route. Cathays cemetery in Cardiff opened in 1859, making it one of the earlier municipal cemeteries, more closely tied to the garden cemetery traditions. As well as a place of burial, The Cardiff Times speculated that Cathays 'would form the principal walk of the inhabitants of Cardiff' (Cathays City Council, no date) and so features a circular carriage drive and a variety of winding paths. However, the newer extension (opened 1914) is laid out more rigidly grid pattern, as can be seen from the map in Figure 10.

3.4.4 Celebrating Death

The importance of the cemetery seems marginal in the 21st century, when rituals of death and grief tend to be small scale, personal and reflect a degree of individual choice. In the long 19th century (1750 -1914) however, death, mourning and the ceremony surrounding it were an important part of the social fabric in France, Britain and beyond. J. S. Curl (2000) goes as far as to describe this as 'celebration of death' and it means that cemeteries were landscapes in which both personal grief and social status were expressed. Garden cemeteries were built to accommodate this celebration and to reflect the social landscape, where the newly emerging middle class vied for status through conspicuous display of wealth. In the context of death, this was done not only through elaborate funerals, but also in the purchase of private graves or family plots and the erection of monuments, which for the first time were becoming affordable for those outside the aristocracy (Curl 2000).

Death was an ever present and unavoidable part of life for everyone, as life expectancy suffered and infant mortality rates were high in the growing cities (Richardson 1987). This was true not only for the poor, who might live in completely inadequate circumstances but also for the middle classes (Shonfield 1987). Although away from the squalor of the slums, many deaths were unavoidable due lack of medical knowledge about the causes of disease and its prevention and also the dangers of city life such as pollution. Pregnancy and early childhood were still fraught with danger too. Most people died at home, and the body would be laid out there before the funeral. The formalised process of mourning was believed to help the bereaved, by giving them a physical expression of their loss (Flanders 2003).

Of course, mourning and funerals also allowed the display of status, with even the very poorest striving to pay for their own funeral and avoid the stigma of burial on the parish. A pauper's funeral was especially feared after 1832 when the Anatomy Act allowed the bodies of unclaimed paupers to be used for dissection at medical schools - a fate previously reserved for criminals. This act ended the profitable body snatching trade, but also effectively criminalised poverty in the eyes of many, and dissection was a terror to be avoided at all costs (Richardson 1987, xv), especially feared at this time due to commonly held sincere belief in bodily resurrection (Richardson and Curl 2001, 25). The poor would pay into burial clubs in order to pay for their funeral, which would usually include coffin, cart and black hat and arm bands for the family. Other members of the burial club would attend where possible, and funerals were often held on a Sunday so that work was not missed, which might mean the body lying at home in an open coffin for up to a week (or sometimes longer if money needed to be raised to pay for the funeral). A somewhat dangerous practice if, as was often the case, the whole family lived in only one room (Richardson 1987, 276-278).

The middle classes would have a far more elaborate funeral, with as much pomp as could be afforded including a hearse with plumed horses, mutes to accompany the procession and formal mourning attire including full veil and crape dress for widows. Funerals were graded by price, and undertakers would encourage the family to spend as much as possible, so as to meet the expected social standard and keep up with their neighbours (Parsons 2001, May 2007). Professionalisation of disposal by increasing involvement of undertakers resulted in a smaller degree of regional and local variation in funerals and monuments – 'paradoxically it often resulted in a greater degree of choice for the bereaved, but a choice that was largely constrained to a set of pre-defined options.' (Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow 2012, 20)

3.4.5 The Great War and great change

The Great War caused social change in many aspects of life, but also had a lasting impact on death too. The scale of battlefield destruction was completely unprecedented and required an entirely new set of responses. In a society where almost everyone had lost a husband, brother, son or friend, formal mourning practices rapidly became not only impractical but also unpopular, as the effect on morale of an entire country in mourning was undesirable. Suddenly the elaborate 'celebration' of death seemed inappropriate and unnecessary (Curl 2000, 210). Also, in almost all circumstances repatriation of the dead was impossible, and so new cemeteries had to be created, close to the battlefields. There was also the issue that many of the dead would never be recovered at all, and yet still needed commemoration. War memorials with lists of the dead were erected both at home and within these new cemeteries, where row upon row of identical white stones with neat grass between formed an overall simple and elegant impression (Mytum 2004b, 90).

The design of war cemeteries, coupled with labour shortages for tending civilian burial grounds encouraged simplification of the cemetery landscape. The introduction of lawnmowers could save time and labour, but when many memorials were close together, with kerbs and railings in between it was hard to utilise them, and grass had to be cut by hand. So new cemeteries often placed restrictions on these types of features and might limit the type and size of memorial which could be erected. At the most extreme, lawn cemeteries might restrict monument to one type only, either a small low headstone, or even a plaque flush to the ground, to allow easy mowing of the whole area. Existing cemeteries and churchyards might remove kerbs and railings too to allow ease of maintenance, and many churchyards in particular saw clearance of older memorials for this purpose - often buried, stacked, or arranged around the perimeter (Mytum 2004a, 115).

After WWI, many of the customs of the Victorian funeral never returned in full force, including extended and formal mourning for widows, the use of professional mourners and mutes, trays of feathers and plumed headdresses for horses. The cemetery landscape never returned to its earlier elaboration, and neither did its memorials, as small, mass-produced headstones became almost ubiquitous. They gave a simple uniform appearance, were easy to maintain and affordable enough for the majority of burials to be marked in this way (Mytum 2000, 16).

Although the first crematorium in Britain, at Woking was built in 1885, initial uptake was very low, and did not change substantially after WWI. In fact, cremation accounted for less than 1% funerals until 1932. It was with WWII that cremation began to slowly grow in popularity, first as an effective way to dispose of civilian dead when resources were limited, but also as a reaction to shortage of affordable land for new cemeteries. In 1963, the pope lifted the ban on cremation for Catholics and uptake increased further. By the late 1960s over 50% of British funerals ended in cremation, and that percentage has continued to rise until the present day. In 2014 the figure had reached 74% (Cremation Society of Great Britain 2015). Even France, which as a Catholic country experienced more initial reluctance to cremation had a cremation rate of 35% by 2014 (Cremation Society of Great Britain 2016).

As joint-stock cemeteries became full in the second half of the 20th century, the loss of income from the sale of burial plots presented a significant problem. As many plots had been brought in perpetuity, there was an expectation that their maintenance had been already paid for, but invariably money had not been invested in order to guarantee this. Many joint-stock companies went bankrupt, with responsibility for their care falling to already overstretched local authorities and amount of maintenance decreased further (CRP 2000). In some cases, such as at Highgate cemetery, this fate was avoided or partially mitigated by the intervention of Friends groups or charitable trusts but in general the meteoric rise of the garden cemetery ended in a similarly marked deterioration.

3.5 Highgate cemetery, London

Highgate cemetery was founded by the London Cemetery Company and opened in 1839, making it the second of 'Magnificent Seven' cemeteries to be built in London. Situated in North London, Highgate is an exemplary Victorian cemetery, described as the 'Victorian Valhalla' because of its wonderful architecture, atmosphere and the number of influential people laid to rest there (Barker and Gay 1984).

3.5.1 Design and initial success

The cemetery, originally known as St James Cemetery Highgate, was designed by Stephen Geary and his assistant James Bunstone Bunning. The landscaping was done by David Ramsay who transformed the landscape with formal planting including exotic trees, such as Redwoods. The main entrance of the West Cemetery is an archway through the 'Tudor-Gothic' style building which houses both the Church of England and Dissenters chapels and is one of the earliest examples of a building with both under one roof (FoHC 2005, 4). Behind the chapel is a courtyard where funeral corteges assembled. The courtyard contains memorials to the dead of both world wars, with a large Cross of Sacrifice and a screen wall memorial commemorating the 95 Commonwealth war graves not marked by headstones (FoHC 2005, 5).

The cemetery was laid out with meandering pathways, which make the area seem much greater than 7 ha and make the most effective use of the terraced slope. Towards the top of the hill are Highgate's most famous features, including the Egyptian Avenue, a corridor of catacombs with a grand Egyptian style entrance. The Egyptian Avenue connects to the Circle of Lebanon, a ring of catacombs built beneath a Cedar of Lebanon tree, which predates the cemetery by 150 years, dating to a time when this area was gardens for the Ashurst estate. Curl praises the Egyptian Avenue and Circle of Lebanon as ‘probably the most remarkable group of cemetery-buildings and landscape design in the 'architecture parlante' tradition of Boullée’ (Curl 1984, 237). And so, what was lost at Père Lachaise when Brongniart’s pyramid chapel wasn’t built, was realised at Highgate.

The Circle of Lebanon originally had 3 sets of stairs leading out of it on the north, east and west sides. The north stairs were filled in to allow the construction of the Beer family mausoleum in the 1870’s (Curl 2000, 89). It was around this time that the outer circle of catacombs was added by Thomas Porter, with their construction showing that demand for catacombs in London had recovered from a dip in the 1840s when they were criticised as part of the backlash against intramural burial inside churches (Curl 2001d, 108). The terrace at the top of the hill is home to the Gothic Terrace Catacomb, designed by Bunning, constructed in 1838 (FoHC 2014, 38). Figure 11 depicts the Terrace Catacombs and Circle of Lebanon features as they appeared before the construction of the Outer Circle and Beer Mausoleum.

The cemetery was consecrated for Church of England burials except for 0.8ha which were set aside for the burial of dissenters in an area screened by chestnut trees (Arnold 2006: 141, FoHC 2005, 18).

3.5.2 Popularity and heyday

Although it was not the first or the largest garden cemetery in London, Highgate is the cemetery which achieved immediate success as a fashionable burial ground (Curl 2000, 92), this continued success included attracting many 'elite' burials especially among intellectual, artistic and scientific circles, although Kensal Green boosts the two most elite burials of all; HRH Prince Augustus Frederick, Duke of Sussex and his sister HRH Princess Sophia (Meller & Parsons 2011), Perhaps this is because Highgate itself was a wealthy neighbourhood, populated by the middle classes who owned carriages and therefore could commute into the city. They flocked to Highgate because of the clean air and beautiful surroundings, including impressive views across the city (Olsen 1976).

The Eastern Cemetery or New Ground on the opposite side of Swains Lane was purchased in 1854 with the first burial occurring in 1860. This site is flatter and more rigidly laid out. Although generally considered to have less character than the older part of the cemetery it still has several features of interest and some very well-known 'residents' (FoHC 2005, 23-25).

3.5.3 Similarities to Père Lachaise

The very popularity of the cemetery makes Highgate comparable to Père Lachaise; because both became 'the place to be buried', both Highgate and Père Lachaise were therefore elite cemeteries, and the prices for grave plots reflected this with even a single internment in a common grave at Highgate costing £1.5.0d shortly after the cemetery opened (London Cemetery Company 1840, 4). This makes them perfect case studies for the comparative analysis and investigating the extent to which influential burials affected the landscape and monumentality.

The similarities don't end there. Both cemeteries have an older part with garden features and a terraced slope, as well as newer, flatter which have a much simpler landscape. Both cemetery sites are situated at high points, some distance from the city and thus provide commanding views. Like Père Lachaise, Highgate also influenced cemetery design, although on a smaller scale, including the O'Connell Circle at Glasnevin Cemetery (Rutherford 2006, 22). Some of these features can also be seen at Kensal Green Cemetery, which could have offered an inspiration closer to home, such as the inner circle on the main drive before the Anglican chapel, but overall the landscape is much flatter and the design less romantic. Railings rather than a wall were used along the boundary with the canal at Kensal Green to preserve the view, but this was looking out towards the Surrey hills rather than the city (Richardson and Curl 2001, 41).

3.5.4 Decline and rescue

Like most joint-stock cemeteries, Highgate suffered decline during the 20th century, especially during the World Wars, even suffering incendiary bomb damage in WWII. The real issues however began in the 1960s and 1970s due to lack of funds. By 1960 the London Cemetery company was almost bankrupt and it was absorbed into the United Cemetery Company, who attempted to keep Highgate open. However, in 1975 low morale and lack of funds led to the closure of the cemetery and transfer of responsibility to the local authority. Nunhead cemetery, which was opened by the London Cemetery Company in 1840, after the success of Highgate, suffered the same fate (Wollacott 2010, 83).

By this time Highgate was in a sorry state, thoroughly overgrown with much damage to the memorials as a result of neglect and vandalism (FoHC 2005, 24). The Friends of Highgate was formed in order to protect and restore the cemetery. Since 1975 many of the memorials have been restored and much of the invasive ivy cleared. However, with only a small team of volunteers it is presently impractical to return the cemetery to the formal planting which required the services of 40 gardeners to maintain and the cemetery is therefore now managed as a woodland nature reserve (FoHC 2005, 26).

3.6 Summary

This chapter summarizes the changes which lead to the development of the garden cemetery, beginning with Père Lachaise in Paris, before considering British garden cemeteries in general and Highgate cemetery in particular. This chapter aims to give the reader some background information about these cemeteries to allow a fuller understanding of the data presented in chapter 4 – 8. The next chapter of this thesis will detail the theoretical framework which will be utilised in the analysis of this data.

Chapter Four - Père Lachaise Landscape Analysis

4.1 Introduction

This Chapter looks comprehensively at the landscape of Père Lachaise cemetery and how it developed. Beginning with the landscape of the estate prior to the creation of the cemetery, through the first 110 years of the cemetery's history; the period 1804-1914. The chapter also discusses the position of the graves of the significant dead within this landscape, and how this pattern of use develops chronologically. Possible reasons why these locations were chosen are suggested, and the effect of the significant dead on the wider landscape are investigated, with a particular focus on their immediate landscape contexts and the graves which directly surround them.

4.2 Chronology and cemetery spatial development

This chapter begins by looking at how the site appeared before it was transformed into a cemetery, and what changes were made and the design decisions behind them before exploring the spatial development of the cemetery. A chronological approach has been taken, allowing landscape change to be charted over time. The cemetery landscape is examined at 15-year intervals with a map produced for each time period, with sample graves and other key changes highlighted.

4.2.1 Mont-Louis and Père Lachaise

When the decision to create four extra-mural cemeteries around Paris was taken, it was initially hoped that the eastern cemetery it would be at Barriere du Trone (now known as Place de la Nation) but the site which was eventually chosen was slightly to the North.
Between 1626 and 1763 this site which would eventually become Père Lachaise cemetery was owned by the Jesuits, who had been given the estate as a retreat for their aging and convalescing members. The house there had originally been built by a wealthy merchant in the 15th century and was known as 'La Folie Renault' but was renamed 'Mont-Louis' by the Jesuits. The new name may have been for Saint-Louis, or more likely in honour of the visit by Louis XIV visit on July 2nd 1652 (Etlin 1984a; 303). Certainly, the house was the residence of Père Francois d'Aix de La Chaise who was confessor to Louis XIV (Etlin 1984a; 305). Louis XIV paid for gardeners who created a garden with 'ovoid bosks and elliptical paths' at Mont Louis to express his thanks to Père La Chaise (Brown 1973, 18).

The house had been built on the crest of the hill, on a terraced site, with extensive views across both the surrounding countryside and the city of Paris in the distance (See Figure 12). In front of the house the terraces were given over to formal gardens, with a kitchen garden at the bottom of the hill.

Behind the house there were additional formal gardens but also more naturalised planting in bosquets of different sizes (bosquet: a plantation of trees forming a copse or grove, in French formal gardens the trees are usually regularly spaced and planted in lines or patterns, often with gravel underfoot). Where the ground levelled there was a transverse allée and above this an area of flat land used for cultivation.

The gardens of Mont-Louis went through many changes in the 18th century, especially as the estate grew, with the grounds extended to 35 acres. The main features added or extended can be seen in Figure 2; the allées which are marked in red and the entrances marked in green. Previously the entrance to the estate had been at the top of the hill behind the house, but now there was also an entrance on the road closer to the city. These features would remain important in the later cemetery landscape. By the 1790s many of the formal garden areas had been converted back to cultivated land after the sale of the estate in 1763, necessitated by the expulsion of Jesuits from France. Some of the garden features including some of the bosquets and the walled garden did survive and would be adapted and incorporated into the funerary landscape too, these are marked in purple in figure 13.

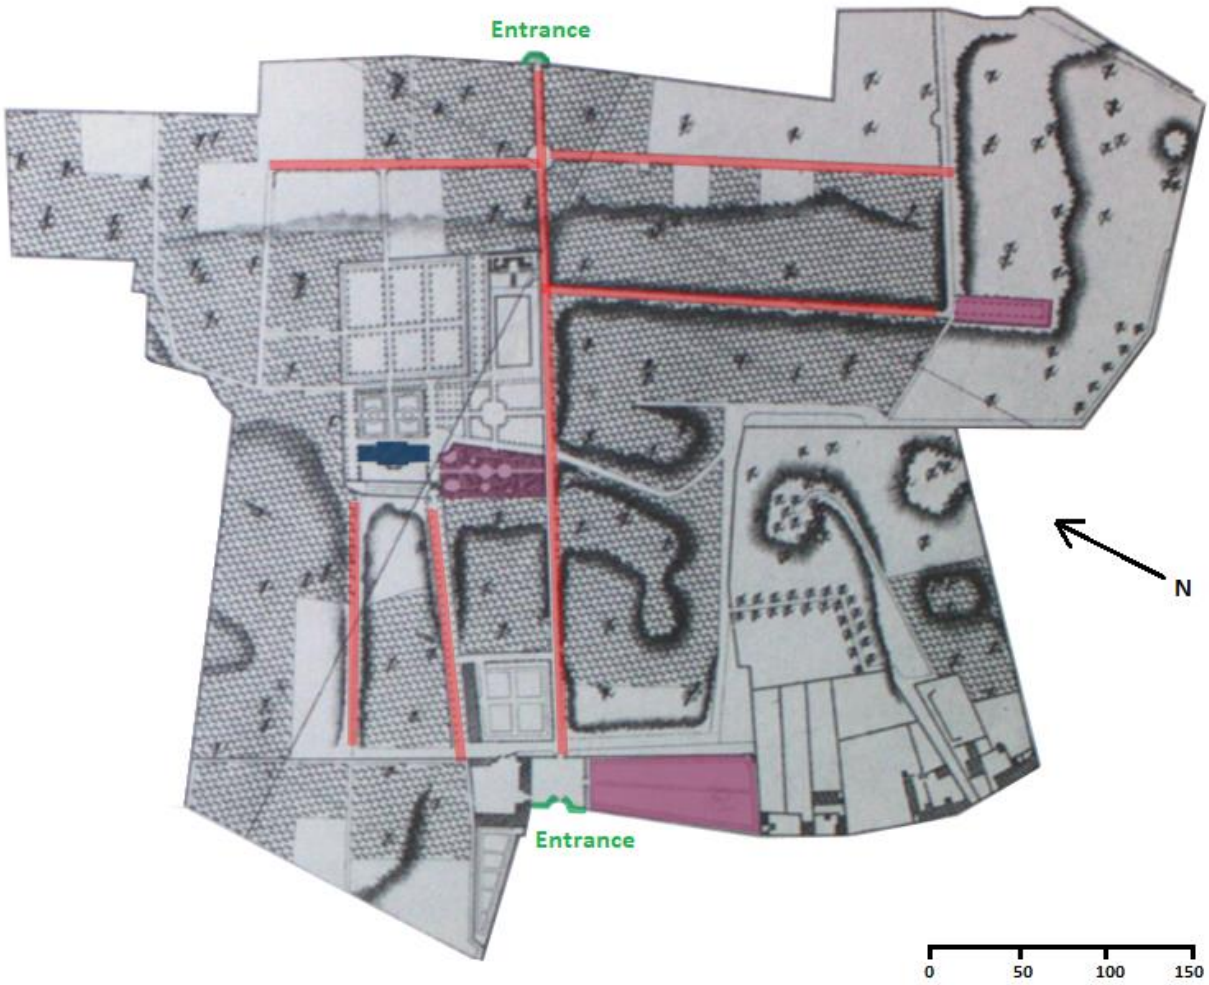

Figure 13 Plan showing Mont-Louis in 1790 (Etlin 1984a, 311). The main allées are marked in red, and the entrances are marked in green. The main house is highlighted blue. Key garden features highlighted in purple.

Mont-Louis had been brought in 1763 by Louis Baron-Desfontaines, who remained the owner through the next 40 years. In 1803 the Law of 17 Floreal (May 7th) authorised the Paris Commune to acquire the estate, and the purchase took place on March 12 1804. According to Brown (1973, 18-19) the villa along with the gardens and other buildings on the estate were purchased for 'a pittance' and Baron-Desfontaines was given only 8 days to evacuate the site, a slight he must have forgiven by 1822 when he purchased a burial plot in the new cemetery.

An arret (In French law an arret is a judgment, sentence, or decree of a court) of 22 Florael, year XII (May 12th 1804) designated the site as the Cimetière de l'est (East Cemetery) and the burial ground was inaugurated on May 21 (Etlin 1984a, 299). Although officially known as Mont-Louis or Cimetière de l'est, the cemetery quickly became known by the name of Louis XIV's confessor - Père La Chaise.

4.2.2 The creation of the first garden cemetery

The architect for the cemetery was Alexandre-Théodore Brongniart, who was Chief Inspector General of the Second Section of public works for the Department of the Seine (Curl 2000, 25). Although according to Etlin (1984a, 303) it has been suggested previously that Brongniart did little more than repair the wall and widen allées, but Etlin draws our attention to the evidence from the 18th and 19th century records to suggest his alterations to the landscape were more extensive. These records form the basis of this analysis, which has been extended to include other maps and sources which were not used by Etlin.

Although the site was well suited to transformation into a landscape garden (Etlin 1984a, 299), this distinctive topography and the remains of the 18th century formal gardens both constrained Brongniart's designs. He used them to his advantage to create a picturesque garden cemetery which combined both formal and naturalistic elements in its design. Curl (2000, 25) highlights the creation of circuitous carriageways and rond-points at carefully selected locations as key features of the design. Etlin (1984a, 303) observes that although the landscape feels natural it is a designed landscape and could have been arranged differently. Within the cemetery, the goal was to create a space in which to manifest state ideals of social harmony (Kselman 1993; 199), which would allow a mood of quiet reflection in an otherwise troubled physical and emotional environment (Kselman 1993, 166). Ensuring that cemeteries were quiet and harmonious would require substantial physical and political effort (Kselman 113, 9).

The design was constrained by the Decree of June 12 1804, which contained rules about grave types and also the landscape of the cemetery. The decree stated that cemeteries should be enclosed with high walls, because this was seen as crucial in creating separation between the living and the dead (Kselman 1993, 201). The decree also stipulated that cemeteries should be on elevated sites, exposed to prevailing north winds if possible and planted with trees (but not enough trees to disrupt airflow). In this respect, although Père Lachaise was an elevated site, it was not ideal, as it had been a noted feature that the gardens there were well sheltered from north winds (Etlin 1984a, 305). The planting and boundaries still needed consideration in the design to meet the rules of the decree.

Figure 14 shows how the gardens were adapted into the cemetery landscape, which features were preserved or enhanced, and which were not required in the new designs. This figure also demonstrates that the area of the cemetery did not originally correspond exactly to the dimensions of the estate. Notably, the area to the east of the lower plain was not included in the cemetery (marked in red). Also, the maps appear to indicate that an area of land was added to accommodate a new entrance gate (marked in green).

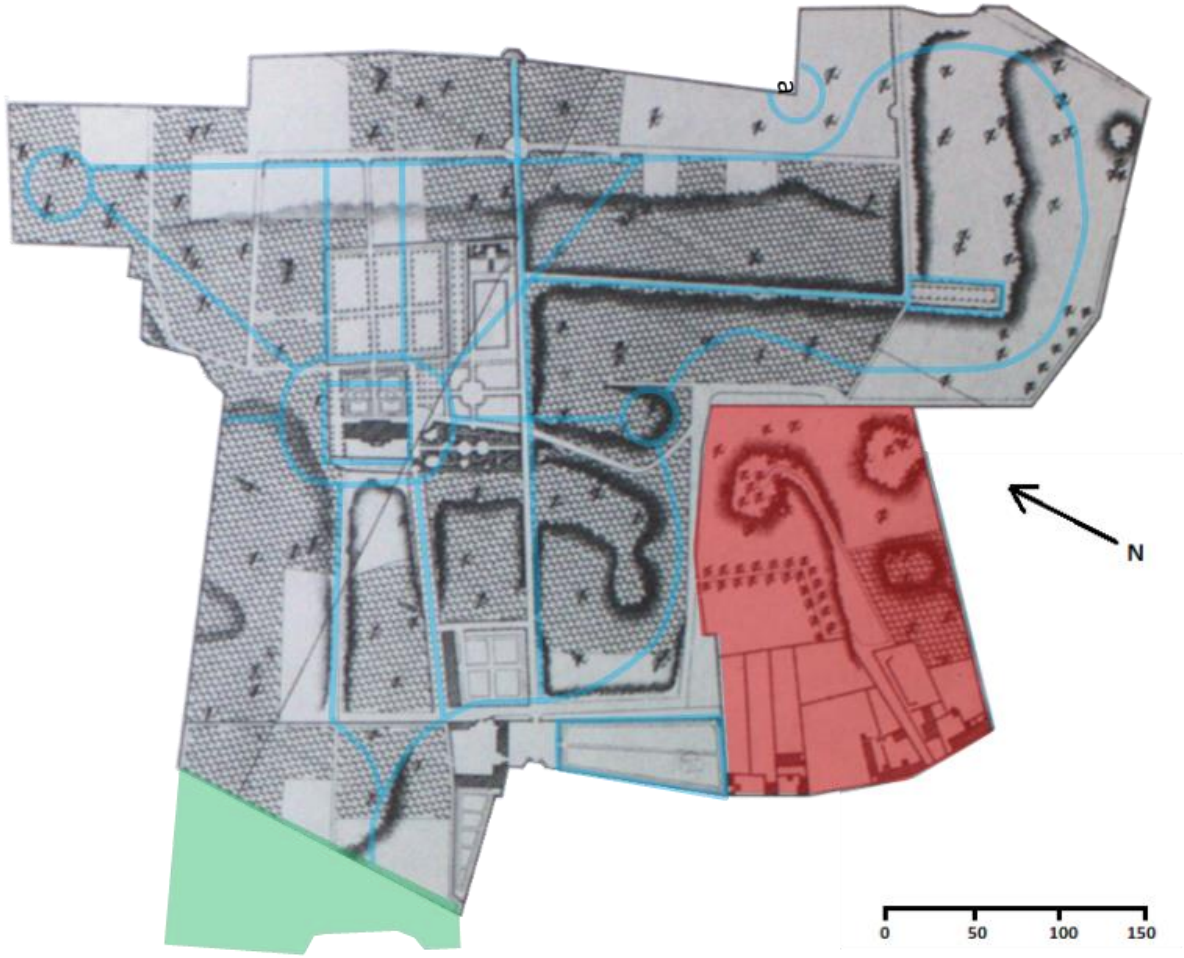

Figure 14 Plan showing the cemetery paths (in blue) from Project III in 1813 (Etlin 1984a, 324), superimposed on the Mont-Louis estate 1790 map (Etlin 1984a, 311). The area marked in red which formed part of the estate was not part of the cemetery in 1813, whereas the area in green appears to have been added when designing the new entrance.

The main differences between the plans are related to the buildings, structures and entrance gate design. This is because the overall layout and the locations for each class of grave were initially fixed very early after the formation of the cemetery. Frouchot and the Municipal council had given Brongniart one month to present a plan for the terrain which included four classes of graves (Etlin 1984a, 310-312). The classes of graves are detailed in table 3.

Table 3 Four classes of graves required by the Municipal council after the Decree of June 12 1804

Class	Description	Location	Price and duration
Public cemeteries	For burial of the poor. Area set aside to allow individual graves. In accordance with Decree - June 12 1804 - separate graves for all with a space between them (30-40 centimetres at sides, 30-50 centimeters at head and feet). Temporary markers to be allowed.	On the 'plains' of the estate. The area chosen was the lower slope to the left of the main entrance, which is shown in red in Figure 5.	Public funded. Graves reused after 6 years.
Individual graves	Private grave with the right to erect monument.	These were to be along the allées and pathways and any of the lower areas of the estate not needed for public burial (suggested area marked in green on Figure 5). The central pathways are in particular highlighted as a location for graves of limited duration.	Purchased for 50 francs. Could be retained as long as the monument was maintained.
Concessions in perpetuity Type 1	Private grave with right to erect monument and arcade.	Located around the cemetery boundary, and each would erect a section of a covered gallery or arcade surrounding the cemetery. A campo santo, where monuments to illustrious French figures would be relocated or erected. The location of this arcade is marked in orange on Figure 5.	Price unknown, but there would likely have been selection criteria to meet to earn a place in the campo santo. Perpetual. The arcades were never built.
Concessions in perpetuity Type 2	Permanent private grave with right to erect monument. Located within the garden and thus forming much of the cemetery	The areas set aside for these graves were the lower right plain and the hill above the rond-point within the curving allée (suggested area marked in purple on Figure 5).	Charged at 100 francs per square meter, plus additional fees for subsequent burials in the grave. Perpetual.
Jewish burial	Graves in an area designated for the use of the Jewish community.	The walled garden on the lower east side of the cemetery was designated for Jewish burial	Price unknown.

However, the types of burial eventually allowed at Père Lachaise were not exactly in accordance with these classes. The first departure from this scheme is that the arcades around the cemetery were never built. Brown (1973, 25) states that this is because individuals 'found the project not worth their investment' and instead preferred monuments which celebrated their individual tastes and accomplishments. This left a straightforward classification of graves with three classes of non-Jewish burial at Père Lachaise; public, temporary and perpetual.

The rules for public burial changed somewhat from this ideal too. The area set aside for the public cemetery as shown in Figure 15, was formerly the vegetable garden of Baron Desfontaine (Etlin 1984a, 317). This relatively small area set aside for fosses communes (common graves) seems inadequate given the 1804 decree which required enough land to be provided to allow individual graves for every person with the right to erect a cross or other temporary marker and to remain undisturbed for a period of at least 5 years (Etlin 1984a, 300). It appears this decree was never followed fully at Père Lachaise – although graves were not disturbed in an untimely fashion, coffins were initially superimposed and later placed in continuous rows without space between them (Etlin 1984a, 317) although markers were still allowed. In fact, as Etlin (1984a, 317) points out, the design is effectively the opposite of that required by the decree, which allowed opulent sepulchres only on the land which remained after the area for common graves had been allotted, whereas at Père Lachaise, the vast majority of the land is reserved for concessions in perpetuity. From the beginning, Père Lachaise was to be an elite cemetery.

This elite nature of Père Lachaise was codified by the Decree of August 11 1811 which according to Brown (1973; 25) created six classes of funeral, with the cheapest funerals priced at only 16 francs (The cost of the grave itself being free, this would pay for the very basics of transport and ceremony). At the other end of the scale the most expensive funerals were 4282 francs. The decree also limited the availability of burial in perpetuity, which was only to be purchased at Père Lachaise and not at other Parisian cemeteries, setting this cemetery apart.

The prices for classes of funeral documented on 27 June 1811 (Fiévée), as shown in Table 4, compiled by Trompette (2012) seem to indicate that this decree was not a radical departure from the practices already in place at the time, just streamlined the previous subdivisions of the fifth class into a fifth and sixth class and then capped prices at the upper end of the scale for first class funerals.

Table 4 Prices for funerals, divided by class (Fiévée 27 June 1811)

Class	Price
First class	6,000 francs
Second class	1,800 francs
Third class	700 francs
Forth class	250 francs
Fifth class	100 francs (subdivided into a lower cost option 40 - 36 francs)

It is also important to note that an area of the cemetery was also set aside for Jewish burial. This was a walled area (Brown 1973, 26) to the right of the old entrance (Etlin 1984a, 320). This is marked in blue on Figure 15. Burials began in this area in 1810 (Viey 2010, 1).

Although it was never completed, Brongniart's designs for the cemetery all include a majestic pyramid chapel at the crest of the hill (located where the Jesuit house was built). Figure 16 shows a view of the proposed entrance gates and chapel from Brongniart's first project, but the pyramid remained broadly similar in subsequent projects, although it is placed on a larger terraced pedestal in the second project.

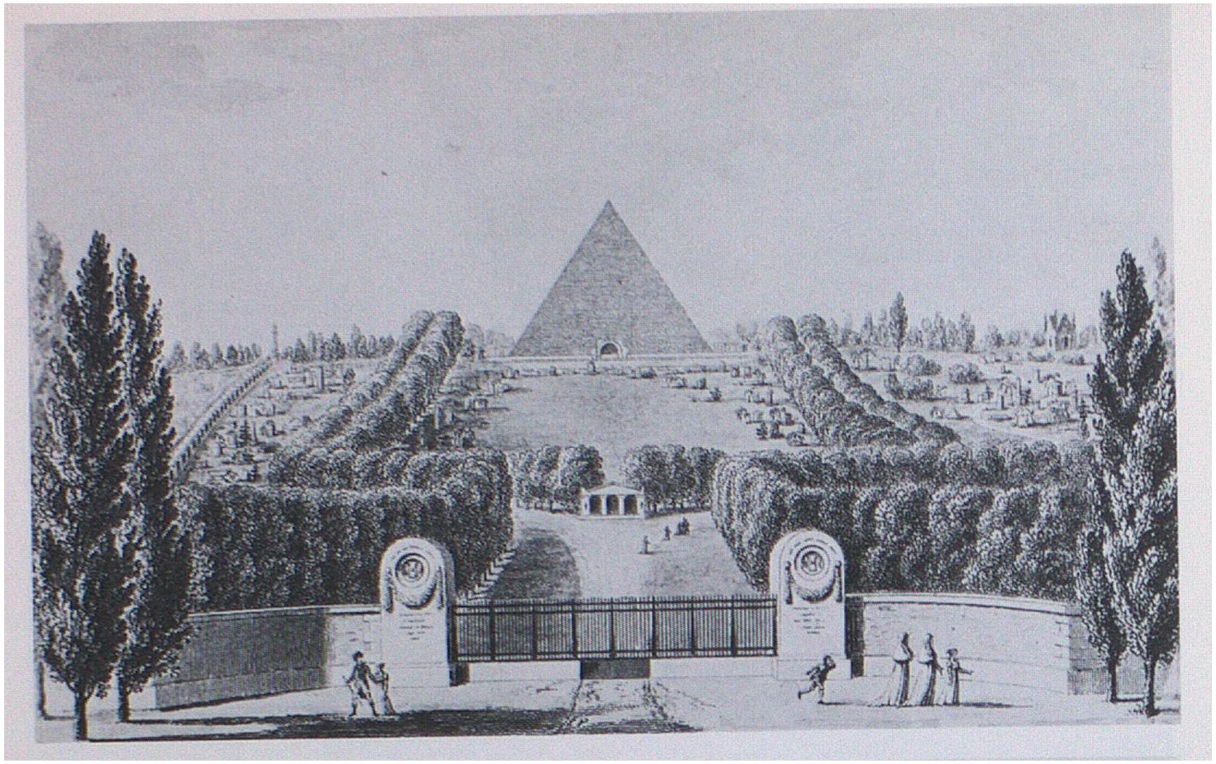

Figure 16 Brongniart's first design for a pyramid, project I 1812 (Etlin 1984a, 314). A similar pyramid appears in all Brogniart's design projects, but was never completed.

The entrance gates proposed in the first project differ significantly from those suggested in Brongniart's later works in which he favoured more monumental gateways with a pediment and narrower gate. These concealed more of the landscape from view on the approach to the cemetery and made the pyramid even more dominant by hiding other features. The small building in front of the entrance where the path divides was a mortuary depot (a small chapel where the funeral cortege could gather) was also redesigned having a single archway to echo the gates (Etlin 1984a, 321-326). The development of these features is shown in Figure 17.

The influence of romantic gardens is clear at Père Lachaise in many of Brongniart's choices, including the sinuous carriage drive which encircles much of the cemetery. It is also emphasised by his choice of planting, for instance his use of poplars to surround the Grand Rond (also known as Rond-point des Peupliers) illustrated in Figure 19, which deliberately alludes to Rousseau's tomb at Ermenonville (Curl 2000, 26) as seen in Figure 18. Ermenonville was one of the first 18th century landscape gardens to feature a tomb, a logical extension of the Romantic tradition of using cenotaphs and follies to act as mnemonics within the landscape. This created a desire for burial in natural landscapes and so the poplar tree was associated with Rousseau and idyllic death in the public mind.

Brongniart also designed three monuments for the Second Project, which he termed monuments de marque (shown in light pink on figure 15), which were all circular with vertical elements. Their locations had already been indicated in the first project; at the rond-points and to conceal the sharp corner in the upper right of the cemetery (Etlin 1984a, 326). The towers for the two rond-points were both circular columns in a neoclassical style which overall had a similar form, but the design for the grand rond (Figure 20) was larger and featured a flaming beacon which would have been visible from the terrace around the central chapel (Etlin 1984a, 326). The third monument was an obelisk, echoing the pyramid in its Egyptian influence. The siting of the three monuments, and their dedication to people of distinction, also recalled the use of obelisks and columns in gardens like Castle Howard and Stowe (Etlin 1984, 317a)

The final building designed by Brongniart known as the 'Gothic chapel' and was the mausoleum of the Greffulhe family (see Figure 29), which was to act as another centrepiece in the cemetery. The Gothic chapel was constructed in 1810 and did function as a centrepiece for the cemetery until the cemetery chapel was completed (Keister 2013, 53).

4.2.3 Chronology of cemetery development and the locations of sample graves

In the first year of opening the cemetery was not popular, with only 13 burials taking place. Numbers of burials remained low during the first decade and by 1814 there were only 509 monuments in the cemetery (Brown 1973, 26). Parisians were reluctant to use the new cemetery due to its distance from Paris (Keister 2013, 7), and the majority Roman Catholic population of Paris was reluctant to accept burial in unconsecrated ground (Ayers 2004, 282).

By the time of Brongniart's death the cemetery landscaping was largely complete but only the foundation of the pyramid chapel had been built (Ayres 2004, 283). Etienne-Hippolyte Godde took over as architect on the project, completing the entrance gates, and restarting work on the chapel. The completion of these new gates must have greatly pleased Pierre Pietresson de Saint Aubin who wrote a guide to Paris Cemeteries in 1816, for in the first paragraphs of the section about Père Lachaise he complains about the old gateway, describing it as inconvenient and unworthy of both the other cemeteries in Paris and the notable people buried there. He comments that from what he can see of the work which has begun on the new gates, they will be more fitting with the 'great majesty of this repository of the dead' (Pierre Pietresson de Saint Aubin 1816, 44, translated by J Wall).

Although Brongniart came to favour a pedimented gateway as shown in his Second and Third project, the gates which were eventually constructed under Godde's supervision bear a strong resemblance to his original design in the first project (Figure 16), if somewhat narrower. The change of design occurred due to a compromise which had to be made. In 1820 work on the gates was well underway when Godde argued that it would be financially disastrous to continue and proposed an entirely new entryway based on the gates of Cemetery of Saint-Sulpice, which had also inspired Brongniart's first project. However, the Inspector General of the Council on Civic Buildings was unhappy with Godde's proposal as it eliminated the shelter for the concierge. Instead the Inspector, Guy de Gisors adapted the designs to use the existing foundations (Etlin 1984a, 328) and the result is what can be seen today (Figure 22).

The fortunes of the cemetery also began to change shortly after Brongniart's death, thanks to an ambitious project by Frouchot. Between 1815 and 1819 he arranged for the transfer of the remains of several notable figures from French history to the cemetery and the erection of monuments to them. The legendary lovers Heloise and Abelard and the literary giants La Fontaine and Moliere, whose tombs all had, since 1791, been part of the Musee des Monuments Francais created by Alexandre Lenoir in his Elysium Garden on the site of a former convent (Etlin 1984a, 266) as seen in Figure 23. In effect their transfer was a trade for the remains of Louise de Lorraine, Henry III's Queen whose remains had been discovered during the demolition of the Capucine Convent at Vendome and transferred to Père Lachaise in 1806 (Brown 1973, 20-21). Louise de Lorraine was conveyed for burial at Saint-Denis and the monuments from the Musee des Monuments Francais were erected at Père Lachaise.

These monuments acted as new focal points within the cemetery landscape and added a certain legitimacy to the cemetery. This was an effective marketing ploy by Frouchot. It seems that Parisians were keen to be buried close to these historical figures, in the way their ancestors had desired burial close to the saints. It is interesting to note that in post-revolutionary France the remains of a Queen had held no such draw. Numbers of burials began to grow steadily from this point. The locations of their new monuments are shown in Figures 25 and 26. Heloise and Abelard's tomb was located on the far right of the lower plain, whilst La Fontaine and Moliere's graves were next to each other on a pathway near to the transverse allée.

Another key event in this period which can be seen on Figures 25 and 26 are the burials of two Napoleonic Generals; Ney and Massena in 1815 and 1817 respectively. Their graves are close together within the loop of the carriage drive to the right of the map. This area became known as rendezvous des braves as other military burials clustered in the area. Figure 24 is an engraving entitled 'The Heroes last rendez-vous' illustrates this effect. It shows Marshall Lefebvre selecting his final resting place beside Massena during the funeral of General Collaud on November 11 1819.

Figure 25 is based on a topographic map from 1815 and Figure 26 on a project map which was created in 1816, proposing an avenue of tombs leading up to the chapel. It seem likely from these maps that the Grand Rond and curving carriage drives had been completed to the right of the chapel site, which is shown with both the imprint of the existing Jesuit house and the outline of the pyramid foundations in the 1815 topographic map. The features above and to the left of the chapel are less certain. In the 1816 project map the formal gardens above the house are still shown and the second rond-point is missing. This throws doubt on the accuracy of the 1815 map, which may in some respects show intentions for the cemetery rather than the actual landscape at the time of its creation. The third of Brongniart's monument de marques (see figure 15) on the sharp corner is also missing in both maps. Overall, the layout of the cemetery bears a relatively close resemblance to Brongniart's vision and has a garden-like appearance.

The growing popularity of Père Lachaise meant that by 1823 some 30,000 burials had taken place there. Of these, 82% were common graves, 13% temporary concessions, and 5% were purchased in perpetuity. Around half of these graves were marked with a monument of some kind (Keister 2013, 8), which shows that even in the public cemetery the right to erect a temporary marker was frequently utilised. The number of burials per year and the proportion which were memorialised continued to increase and so in 1825 there were 26,000 monuments in the cemetery (Etlin 1984a, 320). This, coupled with a particular growth of concessions in perpetuity led to a need for more burial space and the cemetery was extended for the first time in 1824 (see Figure 28). Further extensions up until 1842 would increase the size of the cemetery from 17.58ha to 26.43ha (Ayers 2004, 283) which can be seen in Figure 32. Also, in 1825 the rules for temporary concession graves along the pathways were changed. Rather than being secure for the duration of maintenance they became a renewable 5-year contract (Etlin 1984a, 312). Clearly Parisians had been tending their dead and maintaining the monuments for longer than the authorities had initially anticipated, showing that the relationship between the living and burial landscapes had been completely changed by the introduction of the garden cemetery. It was also around this time (1824) that the arrete which had allowed permanent concessions only at Père Lachaise and not at other Parisian cemeteries was lifted (Etlin 1984a, 335), removing some of the pressure on space, although Père Lachaise remained the most popular with the elite.

The chapel was completed by 1823 under the direction of Etienne-Hippolyte Godde (Keister 2013, 8), although Brongniart's pyramid design had to be abandoned due to lack of funds. The plain Doric style chapel which took its place was paid for thanks to a donation in the will of a pious widow (Ayers 2004, 283).

Despite the growth in burials during this period only two of the sample graves fall within this date range, the locations are marked on Figure 27 and Figure 28 with blue coloured dots. Gericault was buried at Père Lachaise in 1824 and the location chosen is a prominent one, on a main pathway, close to the newly completed chapel. Bellini was buried in 1835, in a grave just to the right of the Bosquet where Brongniart and Delille lie, in fact, directly behind the Delille mausoleum. However, this grave was only ever meant to be a temporary resting place and in 1876 his remains were removed and returned to his hometown of Catania.

Between 1815 and 1820 maps, curved paths in front of chapel disappear and the footprint of the new chapel design is added. The diagonal pathway and rond-point to the left of the chapel are replaced by three more meandering pathways and a more sinuous loop, also the straight path to the right of the chapel is replaced by braided pathways too (these pathways are marked in green on fiure 28). Traces of the rond-point remain in 1820 (marked in red on figure 27) but are not shown in 1829. Also between the 1820 map and 1829 map, the curved paths behind the chapel disappear too (marked in red) and there is an area of land added at the left of the lower plain (marked in green). The Jewish cemetery is also extended slightly, bringing the wall closer to the old entrance to the estate (shown in blue). This extension took place in 1822 (Viey 2010).

Overall, based on artists' impressions the appearance of the cemetery was still that of a garden, although the memorials were denser and there was a higher proportion of larger and more complex memorials by the late 1820s than there had been in the previous decade. Figure 29, from 1817, shows a view looking over Paris from the Greffult chapel, which is the Gothic mausoleum at the right of the image. When compared to a view from a similar vantage point in 1829 (Figure 24), also looking from the hillside towards Paris, this increased density and size of memorials is clear. This is backed up by the comments of numerous visitors to the cemetery, who remarked on the increasing grandeur of the monuments and the increasing popularity of family mausoleums (Etlin 1984a, 240). Etlin also points out that during the 1820s, vegetation in the cemetery also became more profuse (Etlin 1984a, 344). As Figures 29 and 30 show, many of the tombs were surrounded by little gardens with low fences, shrubs and flowers (Etlin 1984a, 348).

From contemporary accounts, Etlin has been able to reconstruct some of the main planting within the cemetery, which is shown in Figure 31. The chestnut trees predate the cemetery, having been a feature of the Jesuit gardens, but when choosing other trees to line the main pathways Etlin believes that they were chosen more for their 'sad and funereal' appearance, because of their thick dark foliage rather than for any symbolic meaning (1984a, 343). However, it is worth noting that acacias are typically associated with immortality and resurrection, and that lime trees, and sometimes poplars were planted as 'trees of liberty' after the French revolution because they grew stronger and faster than oak and thus their choice for planting may have evoked the French ideal of liberté. As already mentioned, the association of poplars with the tomb of Rousseau was also likely to have been a factor in their choice for the Grand Rond.

Brongniart would have been proud to see the Grand Rond attain his vision of being crowned by mausoleum dedicated to a great person, when in 1832, the tomb of the political leader Casimir Perier was constructed at the centre (Etlin 1984a, 344).

Figure 32 shows that the cemetery was extended again, on at least two occasions. The light green areas had been incorporated into the cemetery by 1845 when this plan of the cemetery was drawn. However, this plan also indicated several areas which were still 'Terre en Culture' (cultivated land) in 1845, but we know that after the 1850 extension all these areas had become part of the cemetery. Certainly, the plan from 1855, (Figure 33) shows this area as clearly falling within the cemetery boundary, even while failing to detail the 1850 extension which is merely indicated by the label '(Annexe)'. The piecemeal nature of these extensions to the West of the cemetery suggests that there could have been several landowners to be negotiated with, leading to a series of small additions to the funerary landscape.

Between 1835 and 1849 there was only one sample grave, that belonging to Frédéric Chopin which is located on one of the small sinuous pathways in the right lower plain, location is marked with an orange dot.

Up to 1838 landscape described as well tended, 'neat' and 'elegant' by visitors and guidebook writers. During the 1830s and beyond there were also increasing numbers of family tombs in the cemetery. It has been suggested that this reflected an increased focus on sentimental ties during this era (Etlin 1984a, 357). Brown (1973, 46) implies that the family unit and especially the paternal figure was held to be of greater importance in post-revolutionary France.

Kselman and other scholars refer to a 'cult of the dead' in 19th century France (1993, 6) which was formed due to the unique socio-political and religious context. One cannot consider French cemeteries in the 19th century, without considering the ‘cult of the dead’ and therefore importance of family and the family grave.

The decree which founded cemeteries gave family and friends the right to erect and decorate funeral monuments, which had been forbidden following the Revolution (Kselman 1993, 170). This effectively created the setting which allowed visiting the cemetery, to remember family, friends and great men (Kselman 1993, 204), to become a central ritual in 19th century French family life. It also meant that although some citizens complained about the distance to the new cemeteries, they were generally uncontroversial (Kselman 1993, 171). Cemeteries became so accepted and vital that in the 1860 and 70s there were approximately 70,000 visits a week to Parisian cemeteries, with 400,000 visits on All Souls Day (Kselman 1993, 200).

People became intensely attached to their cemeteries in the 19th century and invested lots of money and emotion in them. This was a space where they could publicly express their most intensely felt commitments; class, confession and family. The cemetery allowed construction of identity, a place where they could convey the meaning of their lives and express their family and communal loyalties as well as other social experiences which were embodied in the location and decoration of tombs (Kselman 1993, 182). Much of the tension between the church and state over funerals and cemeteries was created by Middle Class families and their desire for a funeral pomp and monuments to their dead. There could be bitter disputes because graves were linked to both religious affiliation and class, effectively a final statement about belief and societal position (Kselman 1993, 9).

The new attitudes to death were perhaps best reflected by the right of all to "une fosse separee" (a separate grave), which ensured a base level of respect for all dead in the cemetery. However, the decree also allowed people to purchase concessions in the cemetery, giving them a distinct area where they had the right to burial and erection of monuments (Kselman 1993, 183). These concessions reflected the social structure of Paris, with the rich able to purchase the right to burial in perpetuity, but for the masses temporary concessions priced at 50 Francs were a popular option, allowing preservation of the grave beyond the 5-year minimum at a relatively affordable rate (Kselman 1993, 184). In 1806 a Mason, a skilled, well-paid worker, could expect to earn 3.90 francs a day in Paris (Levasseur 1909, 191) so 50 francs would be just over 4% of his annual income, therefore for most families the purchase of a temporary concession was still a substantial investment, but clearly it was seen as a worthwhile one, despite the fact that prices rose throughout the 19th century, keeping paces with increased wages and standards of living (Baedeker quotes 150fr for a Parisian temporary concession in 1878).

At Père Lachaise, even the common graves were used for the expression of personal identity, as Francis Head observed in 1851 when he visited and found gardens enclosed by an oak railing around many, with crosses and small cypress trees planted inside (Kselman 1993, 188). And for those with more the financial means, tombs on concessions became crucial vehicles for the expression of family solidarity (Kselman 1993, 188). According to Kselman, Aries suggests that burial together as a way of reaffirming family ties was more attractive because families were increasingly separated during life by work and marriage (Kselman 1993, 205). Tombs were also being used to 'fix social identity' through use of enduring and often ostentation monuments. Concessions and the memorial erected on them were an expression of social ambition (Kselman 1993, 185). Finally, the tomb could also be a way of showing religious affiliation and belief, through the creation of a family shrine at the grave (Kselman 1993, 189).

The cemetery was extended greatly in 1850 to current size 43.93ha (Ayers 2004, 283). This was possible because land close to cemetery depreciated in value due to the proximity to the dead, even as the desirability of the cemetery for burial grew (Brown 1973, 30). This extension is marked in green in Figure 35. Figure 33 shows that the cemetery authorities were ensuring that there was never a shortage of graves, by responding well ahead of need. Although a large portion of the divisions in the centre and east of the cemetery were filling up by 1855, there was still space at the eastern edge, and much of the west side was unoccupied, with the exception of a large area which is marked 'Tranchée commune actuelle' (current common trench) which is marked in orange on this plan. Figure 35 shows how quickly this could change, with the Western side being fully laid out with paths by 1862 when this plan was drawn. Presumably this happened before the landscaping of the new 1850 extension, because it retains the same character as the original cemetery area.

Figure 33 Plan General du Père Lachaise 1855 from British Library Collection Maps 16115. (8.) The area in orange is set aside for common graves at this time, note that the 1850 extension is not laid out on this map but noted only by the word 'Annexe' (highlighted in yellow).

The 1850 extension is a sharp contrast to the rest of the landscape, being rigidly divided into a grid pattern with no trees or other landscape features (Brown 1973, 30). This layout was chosen to maximise burial space, to keep up with the high demand for burial at Père Lachaise. The taming of the cemetery landscape under a strict grid, could also related to the changes to the whole city of Paris from 1853 with Haussmann's renovation, which saw the creation of new wide avenues and boulevards, squares and the destruction of narrow crowded streets. This was done for a variety of reasons, some political, but also to encourage the circulation of air within the city and improve hygiene by reducing overcrowding (Jordan 1995). There was also a growing belief that cemeteries should also encourage the free circulation of air and have an open aspect with minimal trees.

One figure who would have likely been pleased by the grid layout of the new extension was John Claudius Loudon, a Scottish landscape gardener whose views about the correct way to create and manage a cemetery were laid out in 'On the Laying Out, Planting, and Managing of Cemeteries' which was published in 1843. His ideas were influential in Britain, and he was hired by the Cambridge Cemetery Company to lay out their grounds. Although his book quotes Strang's (1831) positive comments about Père Lachaise extensively, he does have some concerns about the first garden cemetery. Loudon is particularly concerned by the 1842 French government report stating that the cemetery is crowded and requires enlargement. He believes that this is because 'much ground has been lost in consequence of its not having been laid out originally on some systematic plan' (Loudon 1843, 10). Loudon's book covers extensively the importance of laying out the cemetery before burials begin to avoid wasting ground. Loudon was critical of laying out cemeteries in 'imaginary squares' as it made it hard to find graves without cemetery staff and depended on the accuracy of mapping in the map book (Curl 1984, 242). He believed that whilst winding roads might be necessary in some places because of undulating terrain, in general straight paths were preferable, giving a grand and solemn effect as well as being more economical (1843, 19). This principal is followed in the design for Cambridge Cemetery where Loudon states that 'the interior walks, borders and beds, should be chiefly rectilinear and level... for the sake of harmony of forms and lines, as for economy of space' (1843, 53).

It is therefore interesting to consider that although British thought about laying out the first English garden cemeteries was inspired by the creation of Père Lachaise, it is possible that discussions about best practice for cemeteries in England might have been later reflected in practice on the continent. Certainly, the overall form of 1850 extension would have pleased Loudon, which in fact it bears a strong resemblance to his own suggestion for the best method of extending existing churchyards (See Figure 34).

However, Loudon would have been less impressed to see that one of his other chief complaints about Père Lachaise, has not been rectified in the newest section of the cemetery. He deplores the 'the want of walks and roads' (1843, 10) because of his firm belief that it should be possible in a cemetery to reach any grave without walking over any other, as a mark of respect. He uses Père Lachaise as a negative example of overcrowding because no monument can be approached except 'by scrambling through between a number of other monuments' (1843, 68), something he fears will also soon become true in London cemeteries which also have insufficient paths (1843, 69). He suggests that the solution to this is that all graves in the interior of a cemetery are laid in double beds, with grass walks between the beds, with space at the centre of the double bed for the erection of monuments facing each grave, thus allowing every grave to be reached directly from a path or grass walk (1843, 22-23). Cambridge Cemetery is laid out according to this scheme (1843, 55).

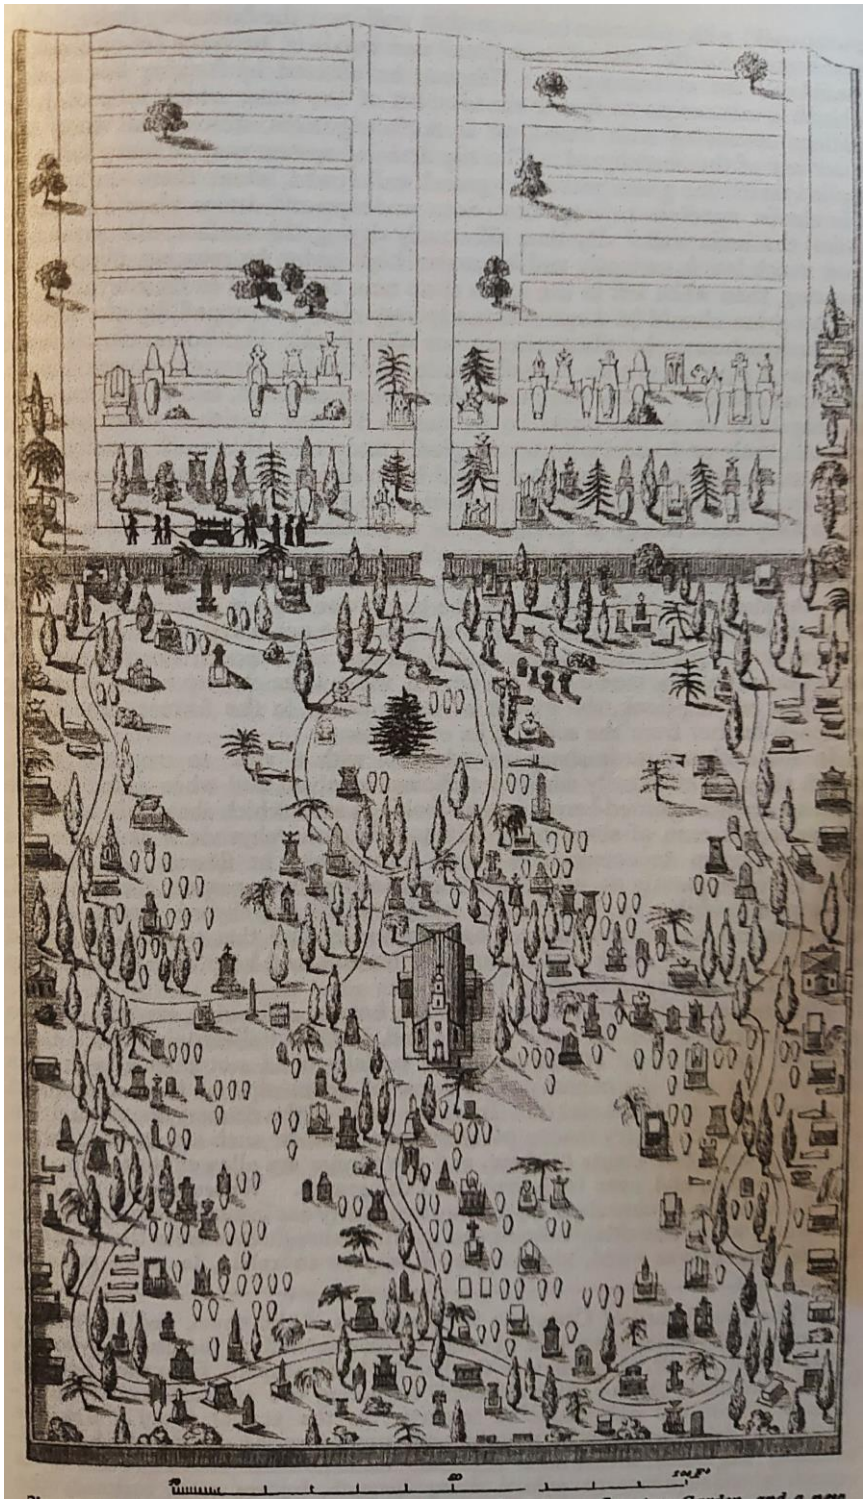

Figure 34 Loudon's plan for adding a new area for burial to a n existing country churchyard (1843, 79)

Loudon was also concerned by the 'dilapidated and decaying state' of some monuments at Père Lachaise (1843, 10), which he attributes to a lack of foundation beneath the monuments, which causes them within 2 or 3 years to be seen 'leaning to one side; or if they are composed of several pieces, they are seen with the joints rent' (1843, 28). He suggests this can be remedied by use of brick pillars the same depth as the grave as foundations for monuments.

There are 5 sample graves from the period 1850 – 1864. Their locations are marked in Figure 35 using purple dots. The grave of Alfred de Musset is prominently located, with its position on the newly created central 'Avenue Principale', which is not shown on the 1855 plan, although space appears to have been left open for it and therefore plans may have already been under consideration. The creation of this central avenue and its subsequent choice for Musset's grave is interesting. In Brongniart's initial plans the path either side of division 4 lead to the chapel and this area is an open slope free from monuments, and in 1848 an engraving (figure 36) seems to show this is still the case at this stage. The creation of this avenue served twofold purposes; it left views towards the chapel open, while providing a new desirable location for tombs to be built.

The inscription on Musset's tomb includes a verse taken from his 1835 poem 'Lucie: An Elegy' which requests burial beneath a willow tree, hence the small tree of that species which grows close to the tomb. However, the soil conditions at Père Lachaise do not seem suited to the species and so despite care from cemetery gardeners it remains a rather stunted specimen, described by Keister as 'spindly' (2004, 76). Alfred's sister, Madame Lardin de Musset, who was also a poet in her own right, is buried in the grave directly behind Alfred.

David D'Angers is one of the few sample graves not directly bordering a pathway, instead being placed high on the slope above the pathway, surrounded by other memorials. This location is one of those which had been designated for permanent concessions since the cemetery opened, and the height of the memorial means that it is visible from the pathway, between other graves (Figure 37) see section 4.3 for more discussion of his grave location.

One of the other sample graves from this time period, that belonging to Honore de Balzac features a sculpture by David D'Angers (one of 8 memorials in the cemetery which bear sculptures he created). Balzac's grave is part of a cluster towards the upper left of the plain, which also includes Nerval and Delacroix. The other three graves are clustered together, all bordering pathways, with Nerval almost opposite Balzac. This grouping of writers and artists is another example of kindred spirits being buried close to one another in the cemetery. It is also interesting to note that this is the first time that this area of the cemetery, in fact any area to the left of the chapel, had been chosen for a

The 1864 map which Figure 35 is based upon shows that Muslim burials were taking place within Père Lachaise, within one square of the new extension. This area was founded because Napoleon III sealed a pact with Turkey during the Crimean war (Brown 1973, 31), by granting one square of Père Lachaise for the building of a mosque and burial of the dead (Franville 1910). Next to this, there is also an additional Jewish cemetery shown, presumably anticipating demand beyond the capacity of the original area in the walled garden.

The overall cemetery landscape has remained unchanged in 1865 because no further extensions to Père Lachaise were possible after 1860. This was due to the inclusion of the cemetery within the boundaries of Ville de Paris and the restrictions on intramural burial (Ayers 2004, 283). As mentioned in Chapter 3, originally the proposal by Haussmann was to close the cemetery and open a new one at Méry-sur-Oise, 19 miles outside Paris, (Brown 1983, 33). However, attitudes to the dead and cemetery visiting, has changed so that this proposal was met with staunch opposition from all sides and Père Lachaise was allowed to remain in operation (Aries 1984, 538-541) and its popularity continued. One major change was however made, to reduce the number of people interred there annually – after January 1874 there would be no new 'tranchées gratuites' or 'concessions temporaires', which would now only be available in the extra-mural cemeteries, leaving Père Lachaise exclusively for perpetual concessions (Moiroux 1908, 20).

The period 1865 – 1879 contains the largest concentration of sample graves with a total of seven (although Theirs died in 1877, his mausoleum was not completed until 1887). These graves are shown in figure 38 below, marked with green dots. This map is based on a plan of the cemetery from 1875, it is not believed that any significant landscape changes took place in the following 4 years. Some annotations on the map note areas which are 'unoccupied', which have been highlighted in green. This shows that although more demand was anticipated leading to the 1850 extension, some of the areas in the earlier extension were not yet in use by 1875.

There are two more sample graves located on the central avenue in this time period, belonging to Rossini and Ledru-Rollin. However, although the mausoleum of Rossini, the Italian composer, is still standing, it now acts as a cenotaph. His body was transferred to Florence in 1887 at the request of the Italian government (See Figure 39). Rossini was responsible to arranging the funeral and monument subscription for Bellini, so it is fitting that the two composers shared the cemetery for a short time, before both left for their permanent places of burial. Rossini may not have sought a burial plot closer to Bellini, knowing that it was only a matter of time before Bellini was transferred away from Père Lachaise. Rossini knew from the beginning that this was only ever a temporary resting place for his friend, having been instrumental in the campaign for Bellini's repatriation.

Ledru-Rollin was a politician whose career highlights included serving as minister of the interior after the 1848 revolution. He even led France, albeit briefly, serving as head of the provisional government after the impeachment of Louis-Napoleon on 11 June 1849. He held this post for two hours before fleeing to England. He didn't return to France until the general amnesty of 1870 (Britannica 1998). His grave has a bust by David D'Angers (Keister 2004, 68). Figure 40 shows that his grave remained a focus for commemoration in the years after his death.

Originally, the former president Adolphe Theirs was buried in the Dosne-Thiers family mausoleum on avenue de acacias in Division 30, which could not be located during fieldwork and so has not been included on this map. See below for more details.

There is one further grave of a political nature in this time period, the grave belonging to Victor Noir which can be found in division 92, bordering the second transverse avenue (see figure 38). Victor Noir was a journalist, sent to organise the terms of a duel between someone who worked for his newspaper and Pierre Bonaparte, cousin of Napoleon III. There was a dispute and Bonaparte shot Noir. His death was seized as a rallying point for the Republicans and tens of thousands joined his funeral procession, following him to his grave in Neuilly cemetery. It was later decided that as a symbol of the turmoil, he should be moved to Père Lachaise. Public subscription paid for the full-length sculpture of Noir by Jules Dalou (Keister 2004, 78).

Of the other three graves from this era, 2 are located to the right of the chapel on the slope leading up to the transverse avenue. Ingres is buried close to the main pathway behind the chapel in division 23, whilst Corot is buried close to the centre of division 22. Both graves belong to painters, and both are orientated so their monuments are facing out towards the views this slope affords of the city of Paris. The third grave, belonging to Bizet, borders the main pathway on the edge of the lower terrace to the left of the chapel. This grave is orientated in the opposite direction to Ingres and Corot, instead framing the view of the city for visitors to the grave (see section 4.2.1 for more discussion).

The map for 1894, figure 42, is based on an 1880s plan, which was reproduced by Brown for his 1972 book, as an aid for modern visitors. This shows that the essential details have remained consistent since that time.

Internally there were some changes within the divisions set aside for Muslim and Jewish burial. In 1883 the area of division 85 which has been set aside for Islamic burials was reduced due to the low demand. Numbers of Muslims dying in Paris were small, and in fact by 1910 there were only 15 graves there (Franville 1910). However, the mosque, a small building with an arched doorway made from alternating bands of white and pink sandstone remained, with the graves around it within a square area enclosed by hedges. This can be seen in Figure 41 below.

The areas set aside for Jewish burial experienced changes too. On both the 1862 and 1875 plans, a second area had been marked as cimitiere d'Israelites – in the square next to the muslim cemetery - division 87. However, by 1885, construction of the crematorium had begun in this area. This is because of a change in religious provision in cemeteries. The 1804 decree had insisted on separate but equal provision for those of different faiths, but conflict throughout the century, especially regarding the provision of Protestant graves, led to a new decree in 1881 which declared cemeteries to be religiously neutral (Kselman 1993; 107). This explains why the wall around the existing Jewish cemetery was removed in 1881 (Viey 2010). After 1881, Jews would have had the right to burial in any cemetery division. The enclosed area for Muslim burial would have been exempt from these regulations by virtue of effectively being a concession in perpetuity owned by the Turkish state. What exactly happened in division 87 is unclear, although the lack of monuments shown in the 1875 plan may indicate that the area had been set aside for Jewish burial, but it hadn't begun to be used when this decree was passed, therefore making it an obvious site for the large crematorium complex in an otherwise increasingly crowded landscape.

Cremations first took place at the new crematorium in 1889 (Keister 2013, 31), and it was officially inaugurated in 1890 although work on the crematorium complex continued until 1920, including the construction of the columbarium with niches where ashes are deposited (Ayers 2004, 283). Although originally intended mainly for the disposal of unclaimed bodies from the hospitals, the crematorium also grew in popularity with 'voluntary' cremations as well.

The location of the crematorium is shown on the 1894 (figure 42) map in pink, along with dots of the same colour marking the locations of the two sample graves from this era, plus the newly constructed mausoleum of Adolphe Theirs (built 1884-1887).

This mausoleum, which was built for the former President, is extremely large and overshadows the chapel which it is located next to. This building, which was paid for by public subscription, organised by his admirers. The importance of Thiers as a public figure was demonstrated by the crowd who watched his funeral procession, estimated at over 500,000 people. Although not an official state funeral due to an inability to agree the between the government and family over the details of the event and high tensions caused by his death, Thiers funeral was used as an opportunity for political point scoring by both the left and right. One thousand people who were ticket holders were admitted to the cemetery for the ceremony at the family mausoleum, which went peacefully (Ben Amo 2000, 174-188), and 10 years later, despite the enormous financial contributions of the public, his reinternment was attended by only a small gathering of family and private guests. However, Thiers remained a divisive figure and the mausoleum was regularly vandalised. According to Keister, even in the 21st century the mausoleum is periodically sandblasted to remove graffiti (Keister 2013, 98).

Another of the sample graves, that belonging to Baron Haussmann, is located on the central avenue, close to Alfred de Musset and Rossini. Haussmann would have undoubtably preferred this location beside a wide and straight avenue to a plot on one of the smaller more sinuous pathways, given that he was the man hired by Napoleon III Haussmann to modernise Paris (Keister 2013, 55). His objections to a cemetery within the city limits (Brown 1983, 33) must have been overcome by the time of his own death.

The other sample grave from this time period can be found in the new extension and belongs to Auguste Blanqui. Like Victor Noir, Blanqui's grave is topped with a bronze effigy by Jules Dalou (Keister 2004, 78). Also like Noir, Blanqui can be considered something of a martyr figure, although of a somewhat different nature. Blanqui was a socialist and a radical, he spent a total of 33 years in prison because of his views and repeated involvement in revolutionary activity. His disciples known as 'Blanquists' continued to play an important role in the history of the workers movement even after his death (Britannia 1998).

1895-1909

Overall there were once again no substantial changes to the landscape, but in 1899 the 'Monument aux Morts' a sculpture by Paul-Albert Bartholome was unveiled at the end of the Central avenue (Keister 2013, 13). This monument was later converted as the entrance to the ossuary in 1953.

In the period 1895 to 1909 there 2 sample graves, following a very similar pattern to the previous era, with one located on the central avenue and the other in the 1850 extension. The plot on the central avenue, marked on Figure 43 with a yellow coloured dot belongs to another French leader – President Felix Faure, who holds a prominent location next to what was then, the brand new, Aux Morts monument. Division 89 contains final resting place of Oscar Wilde.

Like Victor Noir, Oscar Wilde was not originally resident in Père Lachaise after his death in 1900 but was first interred at Cimetière de Bagneux in a temporary concession with a simple memorial stone, arranged by his friend and executor Robert Ross with the intention of later transferring the remains or purchasing the plot outright to allow construction of a more fitting memorial. In the end, a site was chosen at Père Lachaise and Wilde was reburied there in 1909. At the time of his death, Oscar Wilde was financially ruined and so, like Noir, his memorial was paid for by others, in this case an anonymous donation from 'by a lady as memorial of her admiration of the poet'. The monument, designed by Jacob Epstein, was not completed and erected until 1912.

In the period up to 1914 where this study concludes there were no further major changes to the cemetery layout, and no sample graves fall into the period 1909-1914, with the exception of the addition of the memorial to the Wilde grave mentioned above.

This period of stability would be shattered in 1914 with the outbreak of The Great War, which would change funerary practice across Europe, forever. Therefore, as discussed in Chapter 1, 1914 makes a logical end date for this study.

4.3 Factors affecting the choice of grave plot for sample graves

This section focuses on possible reasons behind the choice of grave plots for the sample of 'notable graves' including the effect of grave orientation, viewsheds and also focal points within the landscape. These notable graves are contrasted against a random sample in order to see if the factors which affected them were the same or differed from the cemetery more widely.

4.3.1 Orientation of graves

Orientation was measured as directed by Mytum (2000), by measuring outwards from the inscribed surface of the monument. For monuments with more than one inscribed surface the inscription with the earliest date was used unless there was also an inscription intended to commemorate the collective dead on a different surface e.g. 'Famille' where this was used instead.

The orientation of each grave within the sample was calculated, except for those where due to displacement of or damage to the memorial the original orientation was unknown or unclear. Due to the policy of grave reuse at Père Lachaise for untended graves, the number affected by this was low; only 17 out of 244 graves and none of the 'notable' graves were in this number. The graves with a known orientation were plotted on a rose diagram (figure 44).

This diagram shows that there is a wide range of grave orientations in the sample, but that most fall within four quadrants 20-70° (43 graves fall in this range), 110-160° (38 graves), 195-270° (77 graves) and 290 - 340° (61 graves), with the largest single value of 16 graves at 250° - graves facing SWW. This seems to show that the older prejudice against North facing graves did not hold at Père Lachaise with 12 graves facing 340° NNW. In fact, although in the past Christian graves had usually been orientated E-W, with no graves in the sample are orientated facing due East, and 33% of the graves facing between 225° and 315° (West) and only 23% between 45° and 135° (East).

These main grouping of grave orientation are likely to be due to the orientation of the cemetery with regard to the earlier layout of the estate and the terrain; the allées run NNW to SSE and the grid layout of the last extension to the cemetery is also orientated on this same axis, because it extends from the transverse allées, with paths at 90° to them. The avenue from the main entrance runs from the SW to the NE and the chapel faces out to the SW, towards the city of Paris.

The larger grouping to the SW suggests that views of the city could have been a factor when choosing grave sites and orientation. We know that Notre Dame and gilded dome of the Invalides were visible from the summit (Etlin 1984a, 356) and early engravings show how spectacular the views were from the hilltop (see Figures 29 and 30).

When examining the 'notable' graves in isolation these groupings remain largely visible with 23 out of 25 'notable' graves falling into one of the above noted quadrants, although are less clearly defined in such a small dataset, as Figure 45 shows. Overall, once again there are more West facing graves between 225° and 315° (36%) than East facing graves between 45° and 135° (20%), but this time the largest single value here is 3 graves orientated SSE (160°), for the 3 graves (de Musset, Rossini and Haussmann) on West side of the Main Avenue. It is however very difficult to draw many strong conclusions from such a limited sample.

Because the sample of notable graves and those surrounding them is small in relation to the size of the cemetery and is not designed to be representative of the whole due to the deliberate selection of monuments which might be atypical. A random sample of graves was also taken; however, it was limited in scope – containing 25 graves to match the sample of notable graves. The orientation of this random sample, which can be seen in figure 46 is slightly less closely aligned to the overall pattern of the sample with only 20 out of 25 graves orientated with the quadrants above, but with the largest single figure being 4 graves at 70° inside the 20-70° quadrant. This is probably because the distribution of the random sample covers a much larger area of the cemetery than the notable graves and so has slightly more variation.

The distribution of the random sample can be seen in Figure 47 below and includes memorials in several areas which were not chosen for notable burials at all. It is also worth noting that only 7 of the 25 random sample graves were located adjacent to a pathway, so their orientation is less likely to be firmly tied to the road network and rows and plots within rows sometimes change shape and orientation to make the best use of space (as can be seen in some of the sections in the 1855 plan, Figure 35). It is worth noting that for graves in the new extensions and on the lower plain, views of Paris would not be a factor affecting grave orientation, and as the random sample graves are more widely distributed this means that roughly 50% (12 of the 25) are in areas where there is no view of Paris.

4.3.2 Visibility

The orientation data above suggests that graves were often orientated with regard to 2 main factors – the views of Paris afforded from some areas of the cemetery, and the prominence of the grave to people visiting the cemetery and tending other graves – both in terms of location and also materials or decorations which draw the eye (these elements will be explored more fully in chapter 6). In order to investigate whether these factors were more important when choosing a suitable memorial for a 'notable' person, than for those whose grave plots were in a similar location and the cemetery as a whole, a 'visibility index' has been designed which takes into account the plot location with regard to the road network and terrain in the cemetery, the height of the memorial and any features which would draw the eye e.g. the use of white marble, green copper or polished coloured granite amid the sea of pale limestone, and the inclusion of artworks on the grave which would encourage passers-by to stop and study the memorial. This point system appears somewhat arbitrary, but it was designed to attempt to capture the embodied experience of cemetery users in a quantitative way and was developed by viewing the space through a phenomenological lens. Each grave is given a score on the 'visibility index'- the graves with the highest scores are the most prominent and eye catching. The points system used to develop the index is detailed in Table 3. Graves with unknown dimensions, materials or decoration were excluded from the scoring.

Factor	Points
Distance from path
On path	3 points
1 grave away from path	2 points
2 graves away from path	1 point
3 or more graves away from path	0 points
Path size
Unnamed	0 points (except those given above)
Chemin	1 point
Avenue	2 points
Located at junction of more than one path	1 point for each additional path
Views of Paris
Division has potential for views of Paris (exclude graves inside Bosquets)	0 points
Division has no potential for views of Paris	1 point
Size of memorial (including additional elements)
Memorial covers up to one standard plot (at Père Lachaise graves were sold by square meter, a standard plot is therefore 2m x 1m – plus border ~0.4m)	1 point
Memorial is larger than one standard plot (round down if plot partially covered)	1 point for each additional plot covered
Height of memorial
1cm – 24cm	1 point
25cm – 49cm	2 points
50cm – 99cm	3 points
100cm – 199cm	4 points
200cm +	5 points
400cm +	10 points
Exterior Materials
Local stone (e.g. limestone)	0 points
Imported stone (e.g. marble, granite)	1 point for each material
Copper alloy	1 point
Artistic expression
Decorative motifs	1 point if any present
Sculpture (inc. busts, relief portraits, figures)	2 points for each additional sculpture

The minimum score for example an undecorated limestone ledger slab 3 rows or more from a path in a division with no view of Paris is 2 points. The mean score for the entire sample was 19.8, with a mean score of 34.8 for the 'notable' burials, 14.3 for the surrounding burials and 10.6 for the random sample. This demonstrates that even in comparison to other graves in the same area, an effort was made to make the graves of notable people the most visually appealing, but that these areas were still generally filled with more eye-catching memorials than the cemetery as a whole.

4.3.3 Grouping of graves

Groupings of 'friends of kindred spirits' within the cemetery landscape are noted as important in creating a 'sense of identity' in different areas, early in the life of the cemetery, according to accounts in guidebooks from the 1820s (Etlin 1984a, 355).

These groupings or clusters of influential people within the cemetery landscape, are something which begins with the transfer of remains from elsewhere. Heloise and Abelard were already grouped together and jointly memorialised prior to their arrival at Père Lachaise, but although the bodies of La Fontaine and Moliere had both previously been transferred from churchyards to the Musée de Monuments Francais, their tombs, which are now adjacent to one another and enclosed by a railing which goes around both, were new (Keister 2013, 64), designed to link these popular men of the arts together visually.

There is also a pronounced grouping of military burials, in an area usually referred to as Rendez-vous des Braves. This grouping may have begun in 1815 with the burials of Ney and Massena but continues for a long time and includes many more generals and other officers, including a number which are close enough to Ney and Massena to be included in this study. Of the 14 graves which surround Massena, there are 6 known military graves; General Ruty, Jacques Philippe Avice, Chevalier de La Berge, François Joseph Lefebvre, Jean Francis Xavier Du Menard and Vence, accounting for 42% of the surrounding graves, there are 4 graves which don't mention a military connection and 4 where affiliations are unknown due to the preservation of the memorial. For Ney, the percentage is 38% with 3 of the 8 surrounding graves (7 known, 1 unknown) mentioning a military title or connection; Louis de Fontaines, Pierre Louis Auguste Caron and Merlin de Thionville (whose grave inscription mentions the defence of Mayence in 1793, a campaign that Ney was also involved in). One of the 4 other graves with a known occupant belongs to a non-military government official; Pierre Reboul was an inspector of the treasury. The overall importance of this area for military burial is well documented in guidebooks and engravings of the cemetery, as Figure 48 shows. Perhaps the association between Père Lachaise and the military was formed because the cemetery was the site of confrontation between French and Russian troops in 1814 (Baedeker 1878, 192).

The Avenue Principale has the highest number of influential figures buried along it, with 5 of the sample graves located on the upper part of the avenue, relatively close together. This contains a mixture of professions, but it does include two French politicans; Felix Faure and Alexandre Auguste Ledru-Rollin. These two are buried in very close proximity to one another. In fact, at the funeral of Felix Faure in 1899, the bust of Ledru-Rollin would have seemed almost as another face listening to the civil ceremony and speeches which took place at the graveside (Ben Amos 2000, 199) suggesting a deliberate attempt to associate the men in death.

It is not just La Fontaine and Moliere who found themselves buried beside other practitioners of the Arts at Père Lachaise. The novelist Honoré de Balzac and the poet Gérard de Nerval have their graves located on the same pathway, almost directly opposite one another, and would therefore hopefully consider themselves to be in good company. In a similar fashion, the monument to Corot and his family which was likely erected in 1875, was joined in 1886 by a neighbour; Karl Daubigny who, like Corot, was also a landscape painter and member of the Barbizon school.

The choice of the relatively secluded bosquet location for Brongniart's grave, at a time when almost any location in the cemetery would have been available, suggests that he brought into the ideals of the landscape he designed. This location, enclosed by trees, favours the comforts of nature and gives a certain privacy to grief, whilst still being easily accessible for visiting family and friends. Delille chose this bosquet too, and these sentiments were definitely important in his vision of the cemetery having described Père Lachaise as a place of 'peace, love, and mourning' and imagines his wife weeping at the graveside, her tears turning into roses (Delille, Les Jardins cited in Ariès 1981, 526). Both monuments certainly also attracted admirers, being mentioned regularly in early guidebooks, especially Delille, whose poetry often accompanies the descriptions and engraving of his tomb. The choice of a bosquet which had been adapted from the earlier estate (appearing in the 1790s plans), therefore containing already mature and established trees, would have given these burials a sense of longevity and permanence even within the newly created landscape. The association of these two men, both great advocates of the garden cemetery and its meaning, is unlikely to have been unintentional, they might not have shared a profession, but their attitudes towards death made them kindred spirits.

All of these groupings support Etlin's assertion that 'for those who could afford this final gesture, the public cemetery of Père Lachaise offered an ideal opportunity to realise the vision of a union in death' (1984a, 355)

4.3.4 Location restrictions

We must remember that when choosing a grave location for their loved ones, there were some restrictions placed by the cemetery authorities. The largest restriction is that an area of the lower plain to the west was reserved solely for the use of public burial, we can see this area in many of the maps above, moving into the new extensions to the west as the cemetery became crowded and demand for concessions grew.

We also know that initially the plots bordering the pathways were restricted for temporary concessions only, but that this changed relatively early as is confirmed by the presence of the grave of Ney (1815), Massena (1817) and Lefebvre (1820) along the pathway known as 'rendezvous des braves' in division 28 and 29, which state concession a perpetuity or have concession numbers engraved on the monument.

The map of Père Lachaise from 1855 (Figure 35) shows in greater detail the pattern of grave use in the cemetery, showing that in most cases, there was order in the way grave plots were allocated. In the divisions which are in use, but not yet fully occupied at this time, such as division 4 (see Figure 49), grave plots are filled from the edge or edges of the area, with new graves almost always been added to existing rows, although there are some small groupings of graves which break from this pattern and are located away from others so perhaps exceptions are made in some cases, allowing freer choice. We must assume that the cemetery authorities had some degree of control over the grave choice, by setting a number of parameters over which locations were available at any one time, and that families/benefactors chose what they felt was a favourable location among the available options.

The choices of grave location for the notable dead at Père Lachaise therefore do somewhat reflect broader trends in the cemetery. There is a strong concentration of sample graves within the original extent of the landscape; with only 4 of the 25 falling into areas which belong to later extensions. This shows that the original landscape retained prestige. The new central avenue was utilised heavily to provide prominent locations within an area which was otherwise lacking in available plots. This in some ways fulfils the aims of the design for an avenue of tombs that was proposed as early as 1816, associating the area between the entrance and the chapel with grand monuments which frame the view towards the hilltop. The heavily wooded landscape now obscured the chapel from view in many places along this route, but the monument aux morts makes an ideal focal point instead, much as Brongniart's original proposed mortuary depot would have done.

4.4 The wider effects of 'notable' burials on cemetery landscape

The sample graves cannot be analysed in isolation but must be understood within their wider context, hence the detail collected about cemetery development in section 4.1. The affect which they themselves had on this development is analysed in this thesis in two main ways. The first way is through comparison of the notable graves to those which immediately surround them, and the other is through secondary sources which mention effects on the landscape more broadly.

In some cases, we know that groupings of 'kindred spirits' may have influenced the choice of grave location for both the notable dead and others who shared a common profession or felt some other form of kinship to the notable dead, as outlined above in section 4.2.3. We also know however that the cemetery authorities exercised a degree of control over grave location (section 4.2.4) and that the popularity of the cemetery meant that many areas became fully occupied relatively quickly, meaning that there will be chronological patterns in the choice of grave location too.

The random sample seems to support this, with earlier dated graves associated with the older parts of the cemetery, and newer graves in the extensions with the latest in date being concentrated in the large 1850s extension to the north.

However, we know that Père Lachaise, despite the popularity of concessions in perpetuity, is still a working cemetery because graves which are untended for long periods are resold. Demand for graves in the cemetery is high and therefore there are many examples of resold plots within this sample. It is suspected that graves in the random sample like the one belonging to Famille Thuane in division 40, which dates to 1881 or perhaps later occur due to this policy because of the location within a division which appears full on the 1855 plan.

There is an indication that cemetery authorities are keen to reuse plots close to the notable dead, perhaps because untended graves in these publicly visited areas detract from the appearance of the cemetery, and it is likely that these sites remain desirable for purchase. Of the 11 graves in the survey which are dated to 2000 or later (4% of sample) – 8 of them are surrounding graves and only 3 are in the random sample graves.

In the areas where monuments to the notable dead are not located alongside a pathway it is easier to detect the desire to be buried close to the notable dead in the form of grave orientation. Alongside the pathway it is usual for all graves to share the same orientation, but within the areas which were originally conceived as gardens with scattered tombs a wider range of grave orientations are seen. Of the graves which surround Heloise and Abelard 50% are orientated to directly face the central monument, with another 35% being orientated roughly towards it, and only 15% facing away. This suggests that Heloise and Abelard created a focus for burial. The same can be seen occurring again at a later date, with the monuments surrounding David d'Angers where 62.5% of graves orientated are directly towards his grave (25% orientated away, 12.5% unknown orientation).

More widely we know the importance of 'notable' burials in attracting visitors to the cemeteries, we also know that some of the memorials to 'notable' people became used as way markers and road names for navigating the cemetery – which would have been increasingly useful as the romantic garden receded and the stone city was built.

There are many guidebooks of Paris which mention a visit to Père Lachaise, and also dedicated guidebooks of the cemetery or cemeteries which appeared from as early as 1816 – all designed to help visitors get around and enjoy the sights of the cemetery. Many both in English and in French, of all dates, make a mention of the important people buried at Père Lachaise when describing the cemetery and then feature long lists of their graves to visit.

Piétresson de Saint-Aubin writing in 1816 called them the 'personnes recommendables de la capitale' (1816, 33) ('commendable people of the capital.' Translation J Wall 2022). But was less than positive about their motivations for buying plots and raising tombs in the cemetery 'Les tombeaux que l'on rencontre dans le cimetière du père La Chaise, sont généralement constants avec plus de luxe et de magnificence qu'au Champ du Repos. On voit que ce sont, pour la plupart, des tombeaux d'apparat, élevés, par la vanité, bien plus encore que par la douleur ; car le cimetière du père La Chaise ; qui ne sert guère que depuis douze ans, est devenu le cimetière à la mode… C'est là que les riches et les grands de la capitale choisissent presque tous leurs sépultures.' (1816, 37) ('The tombs that one encounters in the cemetery of Père La Chaise, are generally more luxiurious and magnificent than at the 'Champ du Repos' (Montmatre). We see that they are, for the most part, ceremonial tombs, raised, by vanity, much more than by pain; for the cemetery of Père La Chaise; which has barely served for twelve years, has become the fashionable cemetery… It is there that the rich and great of the capital almost all choose their graves.' Translation J Wall 2022).

Others took a more philosophical approach to these tombs and what could be learned from them, like Viennet (1824) who wrote 'je serai l'interprète de la mienne en payant un tribut de recoissance et d'amour à ce que la terre renferme ici d'hommes illustres.' (1824, 10) 'I will be the interpreter by paying a tribute of remembrance and love to what the earth contains here of illustrious men.' Tanslation J Wall 2022). Before his Alphabetical list of graves to visit, Marty entices the reader with examples of the classes of people to be found beneath the 'la richesse des monumens' (1839, 3) ('the richness of monuments.' Translation J Wall 2022) including an upright magistrate, a famous artist and an intrepid warrior. Baedeker calls them 'persons of distinction (1878, 193) and then suggests that even a ‘superficial survey’ (1878, 193) of their monuments will take 3 hours and offering an itinerary to follow (1878, 193-201). In 1908, the ‘Conservateur’ Jules Moiroux also released an illustrated guide to the cemetery subtitled ‘Sépultures des personnages avant un caractére Historique, Artistique & Parisien’ and provided 3 suggested itineraries before his alphabetical list of graves.

It's therefore clear that the ‘illustrious dead’ were one of the main attractions of the cemetery for tourists and visitors, which would in turn influence the continued popularity of Père Lachaise, and number of people who wished to purchase a grave in the cemetery. It’s clear that it quickly became the place to be buried for persons of note – with the presence of their illustrious forebears being one of the attractions of this elite place of burial.

4.5 Summary

This chapter has explored the complex development of the landscape of Père Lachaise cemetery from its origins as the gardens of a Jesuit house, through the creation of the funerary landscape in 1804 and then 110 years of extension and revisions. The locations and orientations of the sample graves within this landscape are detailed, and there is discussion considering the factors which influenced these choices including views of the city, the layout of the pathways, visibility of the tomb for visitors and groupings of kindred spirits, whilst remembering that the choices would have been constrained by cemetery regulations. The impact of the graves of ‘notable’ individuals is considered both on a small scale and wider cemetery context. The following chapter will make a similar exploration of the landscape of Highgate cemetery. The comparison of the data can be found in Appendix 4.

Chapter Five – Landscape Analysis at Highgate

5.1 Introduction

The purpose of this chapter is to assess the landscape of Highgate cemetery and how this developed, from the landscape of the Ashurst estate, through the creation of the cemetery and then further changes between the opening of the cemetery in 1839 and 1914 when this study concludes. Similar approaches to those used in Chapter 4 for Père Lachaise will be used, adapted based on the types of evidence available.

This chapter contains discussion about position of graves for the significant or 'notable' dead, how these patterns of use develop. There is also discussion about factors behind the selection of these locations and the effect these graves had on wider development of the cemetery landscape.

5.2 Chronology and cemetery spatial development

Chapter 4 tackled the spatial development of Père Lachaise chronologically, this chapter does the same for Highgate cemetery. First the landscape of the Ashurst estate and the changes made to this in the creation of the cemetery are detailed. Then the cemetery landscape is examined through maps at 15-year intervals, charting the changes through time by highlighting the sample graves and other key changes to the cemetery.

5.2.1 Highgate before the cemetery

Highgate village owes its existence to the convergence of several important roads at the top of steep hills five miles from the cities of London and Westminster. This made it a highly convenient stopping place for travellers; which encouraged trade, inns and settlement in the area. In particular Highgate was a stopover for cattle drovers on their way to and from Smithfield (Richardson 1983: 15). The village was spread over four manors, which were all held by religious bodies in the Middle Ages. The area where Highgate cemetery now lies was part of the manor of Tottenhall, in the Parish of St Pancras and vested in St Paul's Cathedral (Richardson 1983: 16). From the 16th to 18th centuries most of the residents of Highgate were wealthy, tempted there by the nearness to London and the idyllic scenery. In the 19th century the middle-classes also moved out to Highgate to enjoy the semi-rural life, taking advantage of the landowners' need to capitalise on their estates (Richardson 1983: 43).

Settlement began with houses and inns around the village green and High St from at least the 15th century. Bordering the green on the St Pancras side, between Highgate West Hill and Swain's Lane several substantial houses were built, which can be seen across the top edge of the prospect of the

Ashurst house began life as 'The Banqueting House' for The Old Hall, which was also known as Arundel House after 1610 when it was acquired by Thomas, 2nd Earl of Arundel (Richardson 1983: 44). Both Arundel and one of his predecessors, Sir William Cornwallis (who purchased the house in 1588), were known for entertaining, so it is unclear which of them built 'The Banqueting House'. There was certainly a building by this name in 1674, when it appears in the court rolls (Richardson 1983: 49). The map below (Figure 52).

Sir William Ashurst purchased or mortgaged the building in 1682, along with a tract of land due to financial difficulties being experienced by the Blake Family. Sir William converted Ashurst house to a residence (Richardson 1983: 70), and the house became part of a large estate, which Sir William Ashurst expanded in 1691 and 1703 (Richardson 1983: 51). Figure 53 shows the extent of the Ashurst Estate.

The image of the Banqueting house in Figure 54 is taken from William Blake's proposal for a charity school drawn up in 1688 and shows the house before the changes made by Ashurst. Interestingly there is a large tree in the grounds, which is not shown in the 1710 plan (Figure 50). Instead in 1710 there is a feature which might be a small tree (or perhaps an architectural feature like a statue or fountain). Both images are only an artist's impression, and the scale of the 1710 plan makes identification of the feature difficult. However, it is interesting to note that the Cedar of Lebanon whose location now corresponds to this area is said to predate the cemetery by around 150 years (FoHC 2005: 10). Perhaps the large tree shown in 1688 had fallen by 1710 and had already been replaced by a young tree which would eventually grow into the striking centrepiece to the Circle of Lebanon. It is hard to be sure as the Map from 1800 (Figure 51) lacks details of this kind. Lebanon Cedars are known as a slow growing but extremely long-lived species, although they may grow more quickly in Britain than in their native climate (Todd 1941), perhaps due to the lower altitude, for example Highgate is approx. 129m above sea level in comparison to their typical growing range of 1000-2000m above sea level in Turkey, Lebanon and Syria, and higher rainfall during the growing season, as water deficit is a known limiting factor on growth in modern plantations (Atik and Aslan 2015). Growth slows in older Lebanon cedars but using an average growth rate of 9cm per year (Atik and Alsan 2015), a tree planted in 1689 (150 years before foundation of cemetery) could have been less than 2m tall by 1710.

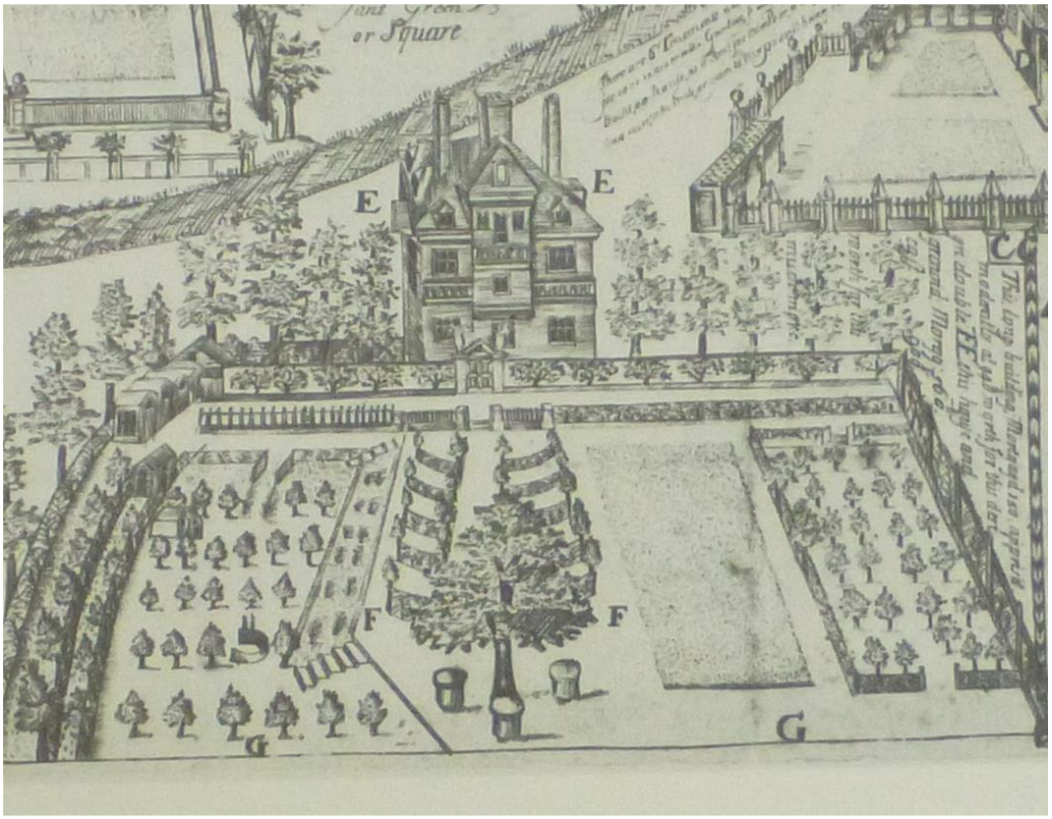

Figure 54 Detail from a plan by William Blake of Highgate for his school for orphans c.1688. It is unclear if the school was ever built, but its proposed location was to the top left of the plan. Ashurst is in the centre and is described as the 'Mansion House of the Petitioner' and details relating to its mortgage are written to the left of this image. The grounds are mentioned as 'Gardens to train up some Youth to that Service' (F) and 'Grounds being 8 acres' (G) (Richardson 1983: 71)

Ashurst House, was later also known as Grove House, itself later became a school, although one of a rather different character. The last tenant was Daniel Dowling who ran 'Highgate Mansion House School for Young Gentlemen'. Sadly, by the beginning of the 19th century, the house was dilapidated, and the estate had fallen into disrepair (Museum of London, no date) and it was sold by the owner Sarah Otway Cave to the HM Commissioners for new churches, so that St Michael's could be built (Richardson 1983: 49). A church was sorely needed because the distance from St Pancras and Hornsey parish churches meant that local people generally worshipped at Highgate School's chapel instead, a chapel dedicated to St Michael which originated as a hermitage prior to the founding of the school. This chapel had been licensed for births, marriages and deaths in 1630 (Richardson 1983: 31-32) but was too small for the needs of the growing population. The house was therefore demolished to allow the church to be built, but the estate's land lay fallow until it was purchased by the London Cemetery Company in 1836 (Museum of London, no date). The company paid £3500 for the land (Barker and Gay 1984, 11).

5.2.2 The creation of Highgate cemetery

The decline of the Ashurst estate meant that by the 1830s no trace remained of the formal gardens laid out in the late 17th century (Bulmer 2014: 17), instead they had reverted to grazing land (Barker & Gay 1984, 11). This can be seen in Figure 55 an image of St Michael's church in 1832, which shows sheep grazing around the Cedar of Lebanon, one of the only features which is known to predate the cemetery, as mentioned above. It is likely that some of the other established trees were also incorporated into the design and the terrace was also extended and reused to create a focal point in the cemetery, but with these exceptions the cemetery company had a largely blank slate to work with.

Figure 55 St Michael's Highgate in 1832 by Henry A Gillman (artist) W L Walton (engraver) (Camden Archive Heal Collection A IV 56)

One of the founders of the London Cemetery Company, Stephen Geary was an architect, civic engineer and entrepreneur. His previous designs included the first gin palace in London and an unpopular monument to George IV erected at Grays Inn Road (which gave the area the name King's Cross), but he had been more successful as an entrepreneur with several patents to his name including paved street designs (Bulmer 2014: 14). Although joint stock companies were primarily driven by financial gain, Geary's early designs show that creating a picturesque cemetery was of the upmost importance, including making the most of the commanding views from the top of the hill (Figure 56). This fits with the social and aesthetic ideals surrounding the creation of garden cemeteries, as discussed in Chapter 1. The London Cemetery Company certainly had high ideals for the cemetery 'At the first meeting…the chairman announced to cheers that Highgate 'would not only rival all other cemeteries' but as a suburban ornament would be 'an honour to the country' (Barker and Gay 1984, 15).

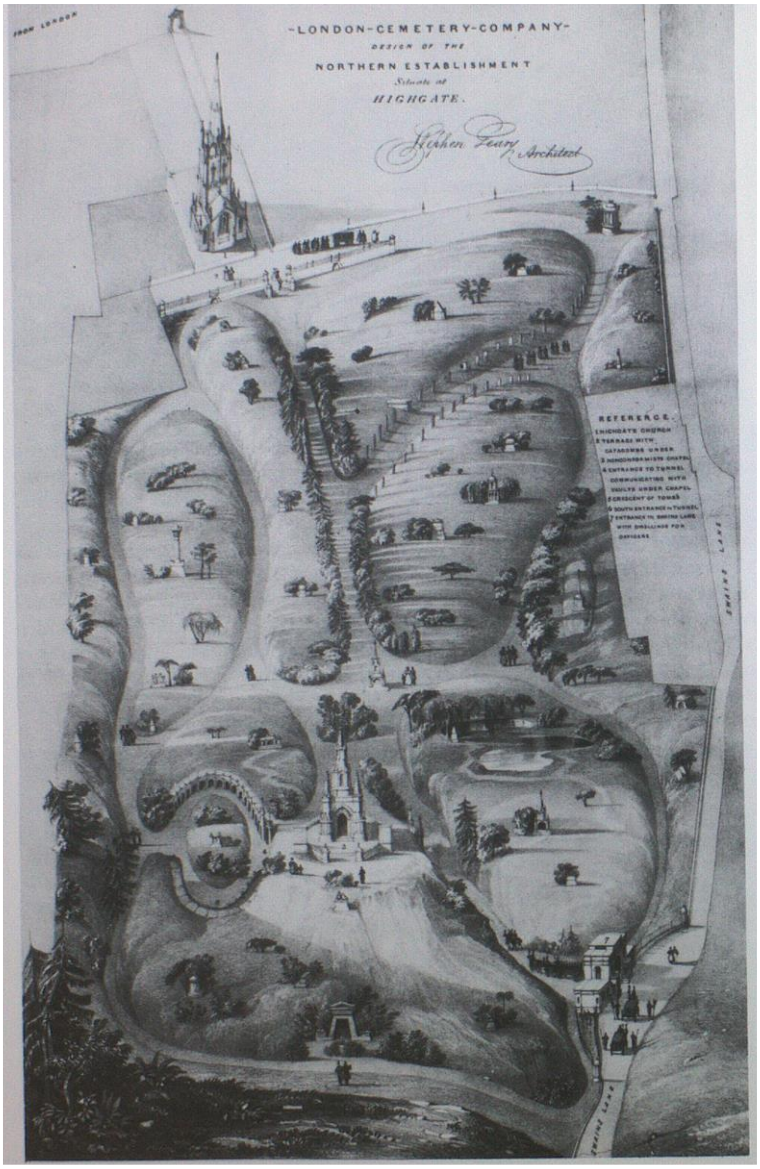

Figure 56 Early design for Highgate Cemetery by Stephen Geary which bears little resemblance to final design but does include curved pathways, scattered trees, terrace catacombs, circular catacombs, a tunnel, gothic and classical architectural styles. (Richardson 1983; 160)

The London Cemetery Company also employed David Ramsey, to work with Geary as a landscape architect. Ramsey was a renowned nurseryman who already had experience of cemetery planting from work at Kensal Green, and so it was hoped his influence would make Highgate 'the most beautiful and popular cemetery of its time' (Bulmer 2014; 18). Ramsey's influence was not just on planting but also on the layout of the cemetery, which would be much more circuitous than Geary's initial plans, creating the impression that the site was much larger than 17 acres. This effect was commented on prior to opening by The Mirror of Literature, Amusement and Instruction; 'the cemetery ground at present enclosed, does not exceed twenty acres; but, by the artistic arrangement of the landscape gardener, Mr Ramsay, they are so disposed that they have the appearance of being thrice that extent; this effect is produced by circuitous roads, winding about the acclivity, not only making the ascent more gradual, but greatly increasing the distance' (3 Nov 1838). Ramsey oversaw the greenhouses and the team of 28 gardeners who were needed to create and maintain the landscape (Barker and Gay 1984, 15).

The consecration plan from 1839 (Figure 58) shows that although the cemetery layout bore little resemblance to Geary's early design (Figure 56) in terms of layout, many of the features which we see today were included in this final design. The area closest to the entrance from Swain's Lane has seen the most substantial changes, with the addition of the colonnade because the intended carriage drive proved too steep in practice to be used by funeral processions. Although it was the focal point for funerals, the Swain's Lane entrance by the chapels was not originally intended to be the main entrance for other cemetery visitors, which instead would enter along Church Lane through a gate leading to the top of the terrace catacombs (Figure 57). This entrance was in use for only a few months as it was not authorised by the Church and the Bishop of London ordered it be closed (Arnold 2006, 139). Presumably, the church had the same concern as the other neighbouring properties, from which there had been complaints about their gardens being overlooked by visitors (Dungavell 2017, 8). This entrance was therefore closed, and Swains Lane became the main entrance, with an additional small entrance and lodge added to the Northeast corner of the cemetery to accommodate visitors from the direction of Highgate instead. There are several other small changes, such as the exact configuration of some pathways which will be discussed below.

The colonnade which replaced the proposed carriage drive was designed by Stephen Geary. The curved wall formed the boundary of a courtyard space in front of the chapel by buttressing the rising ground behind. The colonnade had a central staircase leading up into the cemetery. The covered area also served a useful purpose by giving mourners a place to gather before processing to the graveside (Historic England 1999a) and continues to be used as a gathering place (Figure 59).

Geary also designed the chapels, boundary wall, and the lodges at the Main and Northeast entrances of the cemetery (Historic England 1999b and c). These buildings are in a Tudor Gothic style, built mainly out of yellow brick with stone facings and cast-iron gates and railings. The Main entrance is on Swain's Lane, leading through an archway between the two mortuary chapels - Anglican to the South and Nonconformist to the North (Historic England 1999d). This design replaced Geary's earlier idea of using St Michael's church for Anglican services with a separate Nonconformist chapel lower on the hill (as can be seen in Figure 56).

Freedom of worship and burial rites for nonconformists were an important driving force in the creation of joint stock cemeteries and so it is unsurprising to see a design which gives an appearance of equal consideration to Nonconformist and Anglican chapels being chosen (although the Anglican chapel was later extended giving it a larger appearance). An area of the cemetery was also set aside as unconsecrated ground for the burial of nonconformists. The consecration plan suggests that the division between the unconsecrated and consecrated sections was intended to run along the side of the central pathway running up from the chapels, giving both burial preferences an equal visual weight, even though the unconsecrated area was in fact much smaller. However, as we will see later in the chapter, this balance was not actually achieved in practice.

The high boundary wall which Geary created was similar in design to the chapels, made from yellow brick with a stone capping (Historic England 1999e). In 1839 when the cemetery opened, fear of grave robbing was still a real concern for the bereaved, although in reality the market for corpses had dried up after the 1832 Anatomy Act gave medical schools an adequate supply of unclaimed dead from prisons, workhouses and hospitals. It took some time however for the public to be convinced of this, and security was a real selling point for the new cemeteries, in contrast to the parish churchyards where resurrectionists had been all too freely able to remove their loved ones. Although 'Every corpse in the country was vulnerable to the predations of the bodysnatchers-most particularly in the metropolis and the larger towns and cities' (Richardson 1987, xv) the poor state of urban churchyards had made them particularly easy targets for bodysnatching (Richardson 1987, 79). Richardson and Curl cite security as a reason why not only were high walls also constructed at Kensal Green (2001, 42) in 1831 just before the Anatomy Act passed, but also why catacombs were seen as a vital part of the earliest phase of cemetery construction. Internment in these loculi was the most similar option to deposition in a church crypt, which was highly sought after by those wishing to avoid their lingering fears of bodysnatching (Curl 2001c, 105). Even if experience quickly showed that there were still security issues in the new cemetery, even without determined resurrectionists, with reports of 'miscreants' invading the grounds and improvements being needs to keep the catacombs secure (Curl 2001c, 90). Mytum highlights the importance of monument structure choice for the middle classes and aristocracy e.g. mausoleums, catacombs and bricked vaults rather than earth-cut graves as indicating views about the body, security and bodily resurrection (2020, 39).

There are also catacombs at Highgate, and they are some of the most iconic features of the cemetery. They were not designed by Stephen Geary, but instead by James Bunstone Bunning, who was surveyor for the London Cemetery Company. Bunning designed both the Egyptian Avenue and Circle of Lebanon. The Egyptian Avenue originally consisted of an Egyptian inspired entrance flanked by obelisks and columns with lotus bud capitals, leading to an avenue of 8 catacombs on either side of a tunnel which emerged into the circle. Each catacomb had space for 12 coffins, and cost 130 guineas in 1878 (Barker and Gay 1984, 13). The central Circle of Lebanon consisted of 20 Egyptian inspired catacombs around the Cedar of Lebanon tree. There were stairs leading up out of the circle to the upper level of the cemetery. The original plan shows a single staircase facing the terrace catacombs, but there were later 3 sets of stairs (Historic England 1999f). Early engravings show that the entrance to the Avenue had a cornice with a central winged serpent motif (see figure 60), which was later removed along with the roof of the tunnel. There is some uncertainty as to the date at which the entrance cornice and roof were removed, but Ian Dungavell argues that it was a recent change when the night-time engraving 'The View in Highgate Cemetery' was published in 1877 as the cornice appears to have originally been included and then scratched out (2017: 17), as can be seen in Figure 60.

Figure 60 The Egyptian Avenue as originally designed (The Mirror of Literature, Amusement and Instruction 1838) and after the removal of the tunnel roof (Walford 1877, 403)

Behind the Circle at the summit of the cemetery is the Terrace Catacomb, which was created by 'utilizing and extending the existing terrace, originally forming part of the garden of Ashurst House' (Historic England 1999g) which can be seen in Figures 50 and 54. This Gothic style catacomb, which contains 825 niches for single coffins, (FoHC 2014, 38), although this is still significantly smaller than the Terrace Catacomb at Kensal Green which has space for 2500 coffins (Curl 2001b, 78). This catacomb is also the work of James Bunstone Bunning and forms a direct visual link between the church of St Michaels above and the cemetery below, so that the church seems part of the overall design (Barker and Gay 1984; 11). The stairs at each end of the catacomb lead to an asphalt roof and this remarkable structure may be one of the earliest surviving buildings to be roofed in this manner (Historic England 1999g).The roof of the catacomb was popular as a place to promenade, because of the extensive views across London which could be seen from this high vantage point. This shows that from the beginning the landscape at Highgate was designed as much for recreation as it was for mourning. In fact, many of the features which were designed to accommodate funeral processions - including the wide carriage drives which wound around the hillside, were also of great benefit to those simply taking a picturesque carriage ride in the cemetery. A permanent resting place in the terrace catacomb cost £10, but the Terrace niches were also 'much favoured as temporary resting places for a body while plans were made for its final destination' (Barker and Gay 1984, 14) as borne out by Pridham's research into the terrace catacombs (2011).

The choice of Gothic architecture for the chapels and Terrace catacomb at Highgate shows how much Pugin's efforts had rehabilitated this style as appropriate for cemetery architecture. At Kensal Green, only a few years earlier, there were schisms over the choice between Gothic and Classical architecture for the chapel, with attitudes lingering from the Regency that Gothic architecture was frivolous, fantastic and insubstantial making it unfashionable, whereas Classical architecture was associated with stability and gravitas (Richardson and Curl 2001, 31-32) and so even though a Gothic chapel design won the architectural competition there, it was never built (Curl 2001b, 72).

When Highgate Cemetery opened it was popular as a place to walk, drive and even picnic. Local residents who had initially been resistant to a cemetery being built close by were soon asking for keys to allow them to enjoy their recreation there (Richardson 1983, 162).

Much of the original planting of the cemetery has now been lost, partly due to changes during the working life of the cemetery, but more from neglect during decline in the 20th century and woodland management strategies applied in the 1970s. This led to a proliferation of ash and sycamore trees creating a woodland feel to the cemetery. There are now thousands of trees at Highgate, but most of them are less than 50 years old. 136 historic trees remain (FoHC 2017), from a wide variety of species, both native and exotic specimens were planted including a magnificent Redwood tree. The inclusion of carefully chosen trees within the landscape was consistent with the Victorian fashion for botanical collecting and was encouraged by key figures in the garden cemetery movement.

John Strang wrote a book called 'Necropolis Glasguensis' in 1831 to encourage public support for the conversion of Fir Park next to Glasgow Cathedral into a cemetery. Strang was convinced that cemeteries could serve many purposes including a role in instruction and education. His work influenced another Scottish proponent of cemeteries - John Claudius Loudon, whose writing was well renowned in the fields of landscape, architecture and gardening. Loudon suggested that a 'general cemetery in the neighbourhood of a town, properly designed, laid out, ornamented with tombs, planted with trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants, all named, and the whole properly kept, might become a school of instruction in architecture, sculpture, landscape-gardening, arboriculture, botany, and in those important parts of general gardening, neatness, order and high keeping' (1843, 105).

However, Loudon would not have approved of all planting chosen at Highgate. He had a strong preference for evergreen trees, especially those with narrow conical forms which cast less shade. As well as the traditional association of conifers like yew and cypress with mourning, they were also practical for cemetery maintenance as fallen leaves from deciduous trees increased the care needed, particularly in Autumn. Loudon also cautioned against belts or clumps of trees which would interrupt the dispersal of miasmas or bad air by wind blowing through the cemetery (Loudon 1843, 20). The case of Kensal Green shows that the actual soil conditions should have perhaps been worthy of more consideration in the design process. This cemetery was built on London clay, which resulted in a number of issues with drainage (Richardson and Curl 2001, 46) and the Cedars which were originally planted along the main avenue were already dying by 1838, and so were replaced by Silver Firs (Curl 2001c, 104) as a result of the waterlogged ground (Elliot 2001, 292). The Silver Firs also failed and were replaced by alternating Spanish and Horse Chestnut trees in 1842, along with planting of 50 red and white Lime trees elsewhere in the cemetery to replace other unsuccessful conifers, with few evergreens surviving long-term into the modern landscape (Curl 2001d, 111), so perhaps the weeping willows which Loudon disliked, despite their mourning symbolism, as they were associated with dampness (Curl 1984, 233-235) would have actually been a practical choice in this cemetery.

Loudon also disliked the planting of flowers because the appearance of soil which had been dug for cultivation disrupted the quiet repose he felt cemeteries should have, but if it was deemed necessary they should be allowed only on graves (to suit individuals taste) or small plots which would later become graves, rather than in larger flowerbeds or as borders because he wanted cemeteries to be easily distinguished from 'pleasure-grounds' (Curl 1983, 142).

Although Loudon's death in 1843 soon after the publication of his book limited the number of cemetery projects he was directly involved with, many cemeteries took his suggestions on board and by 1850 cemetery planting was dominated by evergreen trees, often with American imports like Giant Redwoods (Curl 1984, 252) as seen at Highgate. Curl states that 'Flower-beds were reduced or abolished, and orderly, systematized, and easily recorded and kept layouts were adopted. Loudon had triumphed posthumously' 1984, 252). However, it was a short-lived triumph, by 1875 his utilitarian ideas were going out of fashion again (Curl 1984, 250). For example, at Kensal Green 'large ornamental beds' were created along the main gravel walk in the 1870s and 1880s 'revealing quite a new departure in the floral management of the cemetery' (Curl 2001e, 141). By the end of the century the reaction against Loudon's conifers was pronounced with deciduous and Spring flowering shrubs such as Lilac becoming popular (Elliot 2001, 295).

Another late 19th century reform movement threatened the fate of cemeteries and their monuments. In the 1880s and 1890s some authors, including Mrs Holmes (1896), advocated against memorials in cemeteries, which were no longer seen to have artistic merit, suggesting they be removed to allow use as public parks, whilst new cemeteries would be unnecessary if cremation was adopted instead. Sadly some cemeteries, including Spring Bank in Hull, did see clearances during this period (Curl 2001e, 142). Luckily for us, this view remained marginal and cemeteries did not fall out of fashion entirely, even after cremation was legalised and gradually began to grow in popularity during the 20th century.

In addition to the broader sweeps of planting, we cannot ignore another lost feature – the plants which once grew on the grave plots, subject to the individual tastes and agency of the bereaved. Some rules may have been in place, such as at Kensal Green where families were allowed to plant freely on graves as long as any shrubs were not higher than the railings, or their graves could be maintained for them by the company for a fee, which was encouraged as enthusiasm often waned after a couple of years (Elliott 2001, 294). Maintenance of planting on graves by the company must have also been common at Highgate too –in 1906 the cemetery 'had 28 gardeners, and some 300,000 bedding plants were raised on site each year.' (Curl 1984, 252).

5.2.3 Chronology of cemetery development and the locations of sample graves

To assess the overall development of the cemetery landscape from opening in 1839 until 1914, maps will be produced showing the key features and the locations of the graves in the sample, at 15-year intervals. Each map will be accompanied by a description of the changes which have occurred in the intervening period and how these relate to wider fashions and social changes. Nine of the original sample of 57 graves in Highgate West have been excluded because the date of the memorial was not conclusively proven during fieldwork.

The first map for 1839 (figure 62) was produced using the consecration plan (figure 58) as a basis. At this time none of the graves in the sample can be plotted, as these burials did not occur until later. The location of the first burial in the cemetery, that of Elizabeth Jackson is marked. Elizabeth Jackson was interred on the 26 May 1839 in a plot which was 6ft 6in by 2ft 6in and cost 3 guineas, which meant the grave was dug deeper to allow a second coffin to be buried in the grave at a later date (Barker and Gay 1984, 24). She was the first of 204 people to be buried at Highgate during 1839 (Barker and Gay 1984, 24).

Finding reliable sources for the second map showing the cemetery in 1854 (figure 64) was difficult, because at this time there was a shortage of up to date and accurate maps of the capital. In 1851, 6 maps of London were advertised for sale at the Great Exhibition, but all had their faults because they were largely 'inadequately updated versions of maps which had been available for up to the last sixty-three years' (Hyde 1975, 1). Those which are the most reliable; Whitbread's New Plan of London (1851), and Wyld's New Plan of London (1851) are of no use for this research because their northward extent ends to the South of Highgate. The reason for this was that although the skeleton survey for the Ordinance Survey has been completed in 1849 the twelve inch/mile sheets were still appearing by the 1850s, and in any case only showed the outline of the streets 'parks, cemeteries, public buildings and all the information which the user might rightly expect to find on a plan still had to be surveyed and added.' (Hyde 1975, 2). Therefore, finding a map which accurately reflects the changes taking place at Highgate Cemetery is difficult. It was hoped that Tallis's Illustrated Plan of London and its Environs, which was produced for the Great Exhibition in 1851, would offer a solution to this shortage. However, while the map does show part of the cemetery on its very Northern margin, but the cemetery is shown at small scale, lacks detail and is incompletely represented (Figure 63). There is also an immediate reason to doubt the attention of detail of this map which was produced primarily as a commemorative souvenir for visitors to the Great Exhibition – the road alongside the cemetery is labelled 'Swiss Lane' rather 'Swains Lane'.

To counteract this difficulty, the plan of the cemetery shown in the front of the map book has been used as this clearly represents an early (if not original) layout as it includes features which have undergone alteration. Fieldwork was done to corroborate the date of these changes to the original layout, some traces of which can be seen on the plan.

The clearest differences between this map and the consecration plan of 1839, relate to the provision of burial options for dissenters. The unconsecrated area (in light green) is much smaller than that shown on the consecration plan. We know that this area was also discretely screened and delineated using Chestnut trees planted by Ramsey (Arnold 2006: 141, FoHC 2005, 18) and described as 'magnificent' by William Justyne in 1865 (but whose line cannot be successfully traced in 2022 due to the post WWII changes in vegetation). There were also separate catacombs for dissenters shown on this plan in two locations (shown in dark green) - the 'Cutting catacombs', a row of family vaults in a Classical style cut into the side of the hill by the path. The exact construction date is unclear, listed by Historic England as 'Mid-19th Century' (1999h) but the surviving inscriptions indicate that they were completed no later than 1844. The architect was likely to have been James Bunstone Bunning who 'was a keen antiquary and may well have been responsible for the Classical and Italianate look of parts of the cemetery' (Barker and Gay 1984, 15). We can also see the addition of the 'Dissenters catacombs' a flat roofed brick building containing 9 family vaults (although none were sold) and 48 individual loculi (Pridham 2010, 8) just south of the stonemason's yard. The roof of the building was used as a base for a greenhouse until at least 1914 (Pridham 2010, 20). The remains were removed to Cuttings Catacombs vaults 1 and 2 in 1967 and the building demolished due to 'safety concerns'. The site was then sold, and a house built there (Pridham 2010, 8-9).

There are a number of other changes between the consecration plan and the map book, which show that either they were never fully implemented, or were changed before the area was used for burial. One of these, mentioned above, is the addition of the colonnade and steps leading from the courtyard. Others include the layout changes in squares 14 and 43-44 where no trace of the proposed turning circles can be seen on the plan or map book pages. The change from a turning circle to a sharp corner on the pathway in square 33 (highlighted in orange in figure 64) is shown on both the plan and map book page (figure 65), where traces of the old layout can be seen. This change must have taken place after 1843 when the Jeyes memorial was orientated with respect the circle, but before any of the other graves in this area were sold. The earliest this can be placed by fieldwork is 1863 (the date of the Nisbet memorial located on the corner of the path), but it may have occurred earlier, possibly around the same time as the creation of the Cuttings catacombs in the 1840s because other later changes such as the addition of the outer circle and two staircases to the Circle of Lebanon in 1870 (Curl 2000: 89) were never added to the plan in the front of the book.

Of the graves in the sample, only 8 are in place by 1854 (Heywood wasn't commemorated on his wife's grave until 1863). They are spread over quite a large part of the cemetery, although broadly concurring with Barker and Gay's claim that the most important parts of the cemetery 'are to the South and West of the Lebanon Circle where the earliest burials were made and where there are the most interesting and unusual monuments' (1984, 22). Of the 8 graves, 50% are in locations which directly bordered a pathway, therefore commanding a higher price tag. Of these, the most striking is the location of the Otway Mausoleum at the junction between two major pathways, this highly prominent site would have cost a significantly higher fee. Some believe this location was chosen in order to create a vault which mimicked the shape of a narrow peninsular of land, a reference to Sir Loftus Otway's service as a General under Wellington in the Peninsula War. The use of inverted canons as railings supports this theory (see figure 66). The mausoleum is one of the largest in the cemetery and would eventually go on to hold 13 members of his family. The St Albans monument (grave never used for burial) was also large corner plot, and the Wombwell memorial on the same path is one of the most striking and famous at Highgate topped with a statue of Wombwell's lion

Nero. Both are close to the circle of Lebanon. The grave of Samuel Nobel, an engraver and minister of the Swedenborgian church is on the main pathway running through the dissenter's section. The grave which would later hold Worcell (died 1857) had already been chosen as the resting place of his fellow Polish exile Albert Darasz and the area which was eventually known as 'White Eagle Hill' had therefore started to form its special significance. Of the 3 remaining graves not on pathways, one is that chosen for Stephen Geary himself – a few rows back from the main pathway but in an elevated position. The remaining 2 are for the Rossetti family and the Dickens family- both in locations which until later 20th century neglect was quite open with a 'country churchyard' feel, harking back to Grey's 1742 poem 'Elegy in a Country Churchyard' which had been so influential in the creation of the romantic gardens which inspired the early cemeteries (Curl 1984, 223).

The 'New Ground' or East Cemetery also opened in 1854, although because many of the key features were not completed until the following year they will be discussed below. The additional area added was 37 acres and would become the final resting place of over 51,000 people (Barker and Gay 1984, 42).

The basis for the third map (figure 67) was more secure, because Stanford's Library Map of 1862 shows the cemetery in detail, including many of the interior features like pathways and catacombs.

Some trees are even marked, including a line which matches the division between the consecrated and unconsecrated ground. In the Western Cemetery there are 21 graves which date to this period, which is the largest concentration of the sample graves in the West. They are widely dispersed but nearly all fall within the upper half of the cemetery and two thirds immediately border a pathway. The most prominent location chosen is that of the Dalziel family catacomb in the Egyptian Avenue. In this period only one of the sample graves is in the New Ground, and this is the grave of Sgt Robert Grant who was buried in a common grave which is now covered by a small pathway. His grave was unmarked until 2008 when the Police and his former regiment paid for a headstone to commemorate his life. Grant was awarded the Victoria Cross during the Indian Mutiny, and then joined the police force before dying of TB aged 30 (Friends of Highgate Cemetery, no date). The popularity of the Western Cemetery clearly grew even after the Eastern Cemetery opened, and the new area was initially less prestigious. Overall, this was a very prosperous time for the cemetery, and Highgate ‘‘appeared to do well’ for the first 20 years of its existence (Arnold and Bidmead 2008, 342).

This popularity of Highgate Cemetery had encouraged the London Cemetery Company to extend Highgate Cemetery, although this presented some legal issues. After the 1852 Metropolitan Burials Act was passed, which restricted the construction of new cemeteries. However, their original 1836 Act of parliament contained a clause in Section 32 which allowed them to circumvent this issue by using a tunnel to connect the two areas. The clause states that 'Cemeteries or Burial Grounds may be intersected by a Road, in which Case it shall be lawful ... to join the Parts … by means of a Tunnel, and … when so joined shall be deemed or taken to be One Cemetery or Burial Ground' (Dungavell 2017).

The tunnel between the Old and New Grounds therefore prevented legal challenges to the extension despite initial opposition from local residents (FoHC 2005: 4) and so the land which formed the New Ground was purchased from the estate of Harry Chester, President of the Highgate literary and Scientific Institution (Arnold 2006, 142).

As well as avoiding the legal issues, the tunnel also allowed the company to indulge the Victorian fascination with technology to tackle the logistical challenges of transporting coffins from the chapels on the West side of Swain's Lane to burial sites on the East side. The Anglican chapel was extended in 1855 (Bulmer 2014, 40) and a hydraulic catafalque was installed (Historic England 1999d), leading from a 'curved deep-cut passageway' to tunnel which ran beneath the road and emerged at ground level (Barker and Gay 1984, 17). At the end of the service, the bier on which the coffin rested could thereafter descend through the floor on the catafalque whilst the pallbearers walked down the stairs, ready to carry it onwards to the graveside. The exit from the tunnel is inscribed AD 1855 showing that this project was completed immediately after the opening of the New Ground (figure 68), although there is no evidence of use for burial before 1860s (FoHC 2005: 4). The 1861 map shows that a small area at the bottom corner was not yet part of the cemetery and the lower entrance on Swains Lane is also not yet marked. No records have been found which indicate an expansion, so perhaps this area had not yet been landscaped.

The character of the New Ground is very different to the Old Ground. The paths are gently undulating rather than tightly winding as the land is flatter than on the West side of Swains Lane and the New Ground doesn't contain any focal features like the Circle of Lebanon or Egyptian Avenue and has no catacombs. The layout by architects Frederick Wehnert and John Ashdown was designed more simply to maximise the space available for burial (Bulmer 2014, 43), including the positioning of long rows of common graves underneath grassed pathways which can be seen in many of the recorded areas. There were originally 3 entrances – the main gate being opposite the chapel on Swains Lane and at the bottom of the cemetery on Chester Road.

There was no lodge at the main entrance from Swains Lane due to the proximity to the Chapels and offices on the other side of the road, but there is evidence for a lodge building at the entrance on Chester Road, which is marked on map book index (Figure 69, Square 158).

The date when this building was constructed is not recorded but it can be assumed to have been after the drawing of the 1862 Stanford map and before the 1873 OS Map (Figure 72), which shows the layout. However, as burials began in the New Ground from 1860, it seems likely that the completion of this building is closer to 1862 than 1873. However, looking at square 158 in the Map Book (Figure 69) reveals that this area now contains grave plots. The building is present on an aerial survey in 1938 and OS Maps show the building present until at least the 1950s but removed by 1970. Fieldwork confirms that the lodge was demolished by the late 1950s, with the Janes family grave dating to 1957 and a large number from 1958 and 1959 in the area. Some other buildings originally constructed in the New Ground have also since disappeared from the maps as will be seen in later sections.

The map showing the cemetery in 1884 (Figure 72) uses the first detailed OS Map of the area from 1873, however some of the changes which occurred by then are not shown, indicating that the mapping survey may have been done some time before the publication of the map. In 1870, due to the popularity of the original catacombs, an outer ring of Classical style catacombs with Doric cornice was added to the Circle of Lebanon, each had space for 15 coffins and cost 200 guineas (Barker and Gay 1984, 13). The Outer Circle, designed by Thomas Porter, consist of two banks of 8 vaults on either side of the North stairs (Historic England 1999f).

In 1878, these stairs themselves would be lost due to the construction of the single largest and tallest mausoleum in the cemetery (figure 70), designed for Julius Beer by John Oldrid Scott. The mausoleum was based on the Mausoleum of Halicarnassus and contains a striking marble sculpture by HH Armstead, depicting an Angel bearing a child up to heaven (Historic England 1999i). The child is Beer's daughter Ada, and it was her death which prompted Beer to purchase the plot and commission the architect in 1876, until the completion of the mausoleum she rested in the Terrace Catacomb. The plot cost £800 and the building a further £5000 (Barker and Gay 1984, 33). Beer joined his daughter in 1880, followed by his brother, wife and son.

The Outer Circle vault closest to the West staircase was designated as a columbarium after the 1888 licence to cremate (Historic England 1999f). This was the final change which took place to the Circle of Lebanon. The West Cemetery underwent one further change in 1888 with an extension in squares 15 and 23 where the space formerly occupied by cottage gardens were acquired.

Other changes to the cemetery layout include the opening and closure of the lower Swains Lane gate in the New Ground, which is not seen in 1861, but is present on the 1873 map. By the 1894 map the path leading to it is missing. The (non-functional) gateway still survives in the cemetery wall and Square 153 in the Map Book shows traces of the gate location and a path leading to it, but the grave rows are not orientated with respect to this original layout, presumably to maximise space. This path configuration is also covered by graves in Squares 154 and 155 as far as the junction near the centre of Square 155 – instead a narrow path is left running between two double rows of graves. Fieldwork suggests that this gate was definitely closed by the late 1950s based on the date of the first graves in the row which is now directly in front of the gateway (Armes 1958, Young 1958- which can be found in the rows added to the top of square 161 in the map book), but the map evidence suggests that it was abandoned earlier, even if the space wasn't utilised for burials.

A further development in the New Ground was the construction of greenhouses (figure 71) in 1872 which allowed the cemetery company to earn an income from growing flowers. These were removed in 1905 and transferred to a nursery site in Townsend Yard, Highgate Village in 1905 (Baxter 2017, 28). The 1873 OS Map doesn't show their location, but they are marked on the 1894 OS Map (Figure 75).

There are 21 sample graves in this period (the same as 1855-1869), 18 are in the West cemetery and three in the East Cemetery showing that the West cemetery retained its popularity with the elite. Of the East cemetery graves all 3 are bordering pathways, but the original site of the Marx grave was not on a major route, but instead only a narrow footpath, which caused issues as his posthumous popularity grew and prompted the relocation of his remains in 1956, to the location marked with a yellow star in Figure 72. Two out of the three are in the unconsecrated section, the division is marked by the line of trees running down the cemetery on this map. In the West Cemetery, the sample graves are widely distributed, but 10 of them immediately border a pathway. There are concentrations of sample graves around the central pathway (leading from the colonnade into the cemetery) and some other clusters, mostly to the West side of the cemetery and at the top of the hill around the Circle of Lebanon.

The 1899 map of the cemetery (figure 75) was produced using the 1894 OS map. There is one final change to the cemetery layout – an increase in size to the West Cemetery. Along Swains Lane, the cemetery had previously has inset around the land occupied by South Hill Cottages and their gardens. This land was acquired and laid out for burials, opening on 1st July 1888 (figure 73). The prestige and popularity of the Old Ground clearly motivating this move to expand burial provision here even with no shortage in the New Ground.

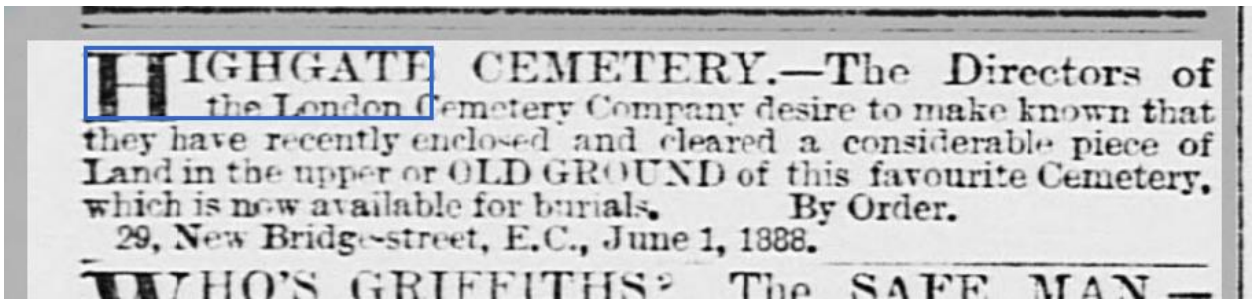

HIGHGATE CEMETERY.—The Directors of the London Cemetery Company desire to make known that they have recently enclosed and cleared a considerable piece of Land in the upper or OLD GROUND of this favourite Cemetery, which is now available for burials. By Order.

There are fewer sample graves from this period and the distribution between West cemetery (6 graves) and East Cemetery (6 graves) is even, suggesting that the East cemetery was growing in popularity. There was still a slight contrast in the types of plot chosen – 66% of sample graves added in the West were bordering pathways, whereas only 50% of those in the East were. Because only half of the outer ring of the Circle of Lebanon was filled with new catacomb vaults in 1870, the other plots were later used for individual memorials including the small gothic mausoleum of Carl Rosa in 1889 which is a listed monument (Historic England 1999j).

Square 142 in the East Cemetery contains no graves and was originally marked only with a small notation 'STABLES' although no structure is drawn on the plan. The only structure related to the Stables which is shown on the Map Book is the drain which is marked in neighbouring square 141 There is a later pencil note which states that this area, were sold as a building site for flats in 1967, similar notes show that parts of along squares 132, 141, 142 and 152 were also sold. An exact construction date for the erection of the stables in unknown, but is likely to be after 1900 as they don't appear on the OS Maps until the 1910s and 1930s, and can be faintly seen through the trees in the 1938 aerial photograph. The stables are shown on the 1950s OS Map but must have been demolished by 1967 when the land was sold to Camden Borough Council. There was also a Conservatory near the entrance to the New Ground, photographed in c.1915 (figure 74), shortly before it's demolition to allow for the construction of the Pocklington mausoleum in 1920. The construction date of this is unknown but seems likely to be after the relocation of the greenhouses in 1905. The exact use of the conservatory is also unknown but may have been multifaceted. The conservatory at Kensal Green originally built in 1862 and extended in 1866 was originally used for growing flowers for the graves, but in 1896 it was rebuilt and used to house purely ornamental displays of tropical plants (Elliott 2001, 294). Perhaps the replacement of the greenhouses with a conservatory at Highgate was related to a similar change of use.

The final map of graves in this study shows the cemetery in 1914 (figure 76) and was produced using the 1903 OS Map as a guide. Overall, once again the number of sample graves had declined, and the popularity of the East cemetery (4 graves) was once again the same as the West (4 graves). In both parts of the cemetery 50% of the graves were immediately bordering a pathway, in both cases the 2 sites on pathways were large plots in prominent locations. It appears that even before the First World War the popularity of Highgate cemetery was already on the decline with their elite clientele, but the East Cemetery had a late surge of elite use, especially with the construction of a large mausoleum for Sir Donald Alexander Smith, Baron Strathcona & Mount Royal in 1914 and the neighbouring Pocklington mausoleum in 1920. Also, the listed Mausoleum of Lord Dalziel of Wooler in 1928 (Historic England 1999k) which is not included in this study.

This section will now explore several possible factors which influenced the choice of location for the graves in the sample and use a random sample to compare these trends to what was happening more widely in the cemetery. The main factors to be considered are orientation, visibility, grouping of kindred spirits and any restrictions on grave choice made by the cemetery authorities. These will be examined in turn below.

The main difference discovered between the random sample and the others selected for this study is a strong preservation bias in the sampling. Out of 25 grave plots chosen totally at random from the map book, only 17 out of 25 had a surviving memorial. Some of these may have been sold but never used, or more likely they were used for burial but the grave markers have no survived. There might be stones which have broken or become buried, or wooden crosses which have rotted away. This should remind readers that the graves of the significant dead are different from other burials in the cemetery. As was also seen at Père Lachaise, there is preservation bias because these memorials have been better cared for in comparison to the cemetery average. Whilst there may be significant dead buried at Highgate Cemetery who are as yet unknown because their memorials have not survived and other research has not revealed their resting place, this is unlikely to be a high number in a cemetery which is so well studied and where 2 graves in the sample have been given new memorials since the year 2000 to replace those which had been lost/absent. These missing monuments in the random sample should also remind us that there are likely to be some monuments missing the surrounding graves sample too – areas which have no monument might not be 'empty' unused plots, informal pathways and so on – some memorials are likely to have been lost over time. One of the random sample graves is excluded from the analysis because HGR22 has already been included in the surrounding graves sample as HGW41.4.

5.3.1 Orientation of graves

Orientation was measured as directed by Mytum (2000), by measuring outwards from the inscribed surface of the monument. For monuments with more than one inscribed surface the inscription with the earliest date was used unless there was also an inscription intended to commemorate the collective dead on a different surface e.g. 'The Family Grave of' where this was used instead.

When producing rose diagrams to show the orientation of graves, some had to be excluded because the original orientation of the memorial was unknown or uncertain – either due to displacement or destruction of the memorial, or because vegetation cover was too dense to assess the condition of the memorial or inscription. Orientation was known for 97% of the 'notable' graves in the sample. For the surrounding graves it was slightly lower – 91% reflecting a larger number of displaced monuments. For the random sample it was much lower – only 68%. Therefore, for the total sample (including 'influential', surrounding and random graves) the orientation of 91% of the graves was known with certainty. Figure 77 shows the orientation of the 'notable' graves only, Figure 78 shows only the graves which surround them, and Figure 79 shows all the graves in the sample. The random sample was not graphed seperately, because there were only 16 graves of known orientation, but adding this data to the rest of the sample did not change the overall pattern – nearly all the random sample graves shared an orientation with many other graves in the sample.

Figure 77 suggests that the highest number of graves are orientated to the Northeast and Southeast, with another cluster in the Southwest. To see if there was a difference between the orientation of the 'influential' graves and the others in the sample, those were also analysed separately.

The overall pattern can be seen in Figure 79. The largest concentration is of graves which are orientated facing NE, but there are fewer graves orientated to the NW than to the SE and SW. Overall there are slightly more South facing graves i.e. an orientation between 90°- 270° with 273 in total than there are North facing graves (244 in total), but the South facing ones are much more variable than the North facing ones which are strongly clustered towards the NE. It is also interesting to note that East is much more popular than West overall (333 graves to 184 graves).

Traditionally Christian graves were orientated on an E-W axis to provide the resurrected dead with a view of the rising sun on judgement day, and in fact orientating the dead with their feet towards the rising sun has even older pre-Christian roots (Richardson 1987, 6). Richardson (1987, 6) states that this traditional significance of this orientation was lost with the advent of urban cemeteries in the 19th century because they were planned on 'picturesque, utilitarian and socially stratified lines, rather than those of tradition'. This study seems to confirm that because the negative association of North had clearly waned at Highgate. While it seems unlikely that the choice of a Southeast facing slope for the cemetery site was entirely at random, it may not have been chosen for theological reasons. Loudon advocates for 'elevated and airy' cemetery sites which are 'open to the north, but with a south aspect, that the surface may be dried by the sun' thus avoiding surface moisture in the winter months (Loudon 1843, 14) for reasons of practicality and hygiene. We can also consider that the garden cemetery aimed to remove 'morbid' and 'gloomy' associations from the cemetery and a Southeast facing site would be sunnier and lighter than a Northwest facing one. Individual grave orientation appears to be more variable in at Highgate than the traditional usage in churchyards, but 36% of the graves are orientated between 45° and 135°, more than any other quadrant, therefore a significant proportion would have a view of the dawn, regardless of whether this was a motivating factor.

However, this sample is small, and by its very nature not representative of the cemetery as a whole. Therefore, a wider study would be needed to see whether these trends held more widely. Doing this using memorial recording is impractical for this study, so instead the map books were used to estimate orientation. Inspection of the map books, show that individual grave owners had limited ability to choose orientation because of the way the cemetery is divided into plots. The plots which border the main pathways or boundary walls are mostly orientated perpendicular to these features, and on some pathways this applies to the second or third row of graves as well, whilst the interior of each section is divided into plots in rows which usually all share the same orientation. The map book cannot allow us to be sure of the orientation of every memorial, because although memorials are usually orientated to be perpendicular to the plot, they are sometimes parallel (e.g. chest tombs) or have a different orientation entirely, especially for irregular shaped plots e.g. corners). Also, even if memorials are assumed to be perpendicular, the map books give no indication of which end of the plot the memorial is facing towards, and this may vary along the row or between adjacent rows.

Despite these limitations, looking at the map books can reveal some basic trends about orientation of graves at Highgate. The map is divided into 168 squares, 152 of which have some grave plots marked on them. Of those, 138 have at least one area where there is a block of plots with a shared orientation which could be measured (see Figure 80).

Figure 80 shows the orientation of grave plots is much more variable in the Old Ground than the New Ground. In the Old Ground, orientation of blocks of graves is usually in reference to one of the boundary walls e.g. in Squares 2 – 7 the graves are orientated perpendicular to the boundary wall at the top of the cemetery and run broadly SE- NW, and there are areas along other boundaries (Squares 17, 25, 33, 41 and 8, 16, 23) where the graves are perpendicular to these boundary walls instead giving a SW-NE orientation. The interior is divided into a few large blocks where the orientation is roughly the same across large areas, probably chosen with regard to the angle of slope on the terrain. In the New Ground, orientation is largely consistent across the whole site, which is topographically less complex and has a simpler layout with the vast majority of graves aligned roughly North-South. This seems to show that whatever the motivations of individual grave owners, the cemetery company was unconcerned with ensuring grave plots were orientated E-W, which could have easily been chosen instead – but was presumably avoided so that memorials would be orientated roughly parallel to the contour of the slope.

This analysis also suggests that in general, grave owners had limited choice about grave and memorial orientation. In general, orientation was chosen by the cemetery company for practical reasons, to increase efficient use of space and with regard to cemetery features, especially the pathways and boundary walls.

The groupings of orientation seen within the sample, therefore relate almost entirely to their general proximity to pathways, with the memorials orientated perpendicular to the nearest pathway, for other efficient use of space and ease of viewing by visitors. However, as the visibility analysis below will show, some of the graves are orientated in such a way that the aspect of St Michael's church or views out over the city of London would have been nicely framed by their orientation in that location, which may have been a contributing factor to choosing those location and memorial orientation.

5.3.2 Visibility

It is not practical to undertake viewshed analysis for each sample memorial, because there are too many factors to be considered in such a complex and cluttered landscape e.g. the exact height and positioning of each tree, shrub and memorial which could affect the visibility of each memorial and also what could be seen from these points.

Therefore instead, viewsheds have been produced which replicated a human observer standing at 5 main points in the landscape. These have been chosen in the West Cemetery because the East Cemetery is largely open and topographically uniform- sloping down relatively evenly from the top gate to the bottom gate. The height of the observer is set at 167cm, which was the average height of a man in 1870 according to Parkinson (2013). Any inaccuracy in these viewsheds is likely due to the terrain data available (OS DTM 5m data) which is not fine grained enough to distinguish fluctuations in terrain which occur closer than 5m apart e.g. Circle of Lebanon may not be accurately be accounted for.

These give a rough indication which areas of the cemetery, and therefore which graves might have originally been visible from these points:

1. the roof of the terrace catacomb at centre by front balustrade
2. the path in front of entrance to the Egyptian Avenue
3. the main junction of pathways in the west cemetery now known as 'Comforts Corner'
4. the top of the stairs which lead through the screen wall
5. the entrance from Swains Lane, upon entering the courtyard between the chapels

This figure (81) interestingly shows that a large portion of the main road network would likely have been visible from the roof of the terrace catacomb, close to the original entrance to the cemetery for visitors. Even after the main entrance moved, the roof of the terrace was popular for promenading and therefore being visible from this location would have remained important.

The lack of visibility of much of the area to the East side of the cemetery may explain the decision to place the unconsecrated ground in this area behind a screen of Chestnut trees. The lack of visibility of the area to the West may suggest why this was initially unpopular for sample graves.

The viewshed from in front of the Egyptian Avenue (figure 82), seems most likely to contain some small inaccuracies, due to the avenue forming a tunnel which is unlikely to be accounted for on the topographic survey, especially as it originally had a roof. It is therefore possible that some of the features looking towards the terrace catacomb are not visible. However, it is interesting to note that it seems likely that most of the circular road was originally visible from this location, giving this area a prominence, which is no longer clear due to the tree growth in the cemetery.

The importance of this junction of pathways becomes clear in the viewshed (figure 83), with nearly the entire cemetery landscape visible from this spot, although the courtyard and chapels would be hidden below the slope of the hill, and some pathways would disappear around corners, offering intrigue to the eye.

This viewshed (figure 84) shows the first view which would have been revealed to mourners entering the cemetery from the courtyard on foot, which makes the graves lining this pathway especially prominent. It is important to note that although the base of the Otway mausoleum cannot be seen from this point, it is likely that the roof would have been visible due to its height. All of the other main cemetery features are still hidden from this location, and not revealed until reaching the

The view from the courtyard entrance (figure 85) is very similar, with only small parts of the landscape visible. In fact, even more of the landscape may have been hidden after the construction of the screen wall colonnade. This would however create a secluded and intimate atmosphere appropriate for the gathering funeral cortege.

The visibility index used at Père Lachaise in chapter four was also used at Highgate cemetery, with some small changes (table 6); the plot size was adjusted to 6'6" x 2'6" (198cm x 76cm) based on measurements given in the burial registers (London Cemetery Company 1839-onwards) where this is the standard plot size for a private earth cut grave, although wider graves of 2'9" and 3' are also seen and bricked graves start at 9' x 4' (122cm x 274cm). The pathways have also been classified differently too – with distinction between major, minor and grassed/unsurfaced pathways.

Table 6 Visibility index score table, used to calculate scores for each grave in the sample.

Factor	Points
Distance from path
On path	3 points
1 grave away from path	2 points
2 graves away from path	1 point
3 or more graves away from path	0 points
Path size
Grassed or unsurfaced path	0 points (except those given above)
Minor pathways	1 point
Major pathways	2 points
Views of London
Division has potential for views of London	0 points
Division has no potential for views of London	1 point
Size of memorial (including additional elements)
Memorial covers up to one standard plot (198cm x 76cm)	1 point
Memorial is larger than one standard plot (round down if plot partially covered)	1 point for each additional plot covered
Height of memorial
1cm – 24cm	1 point
25cm – 49cm	2 points
50cm – 99cm	3 points
100cm – 199cm	4 points
200cm +	5 points
400cm +	10 points
Exterior Materials
Inexpensive stone (e.g. limestone)	0 points
Expensive stone (e.g. marble, granite)	1 point for each material
Copper alloy	1 point
Artistic expression
Decorative motifs	1 point if any present
Sculpture (inc. busts, relief portraits, figures)	2 points for each additional sculpture

The graves with the highest visibility scores are the large mausoleums for Otway (score 51) and Beer (score 48), but even with these excluded the mean visibility index for the 'notable' graves is 11.7, whilst for the surrounding graves it is 10.6 and for the random sample graves with surviving memorials is 9.5. Therefore, it seems clear that even in comparison to those surrounding them, which are in equally prominent locations (the plots for which would have cost a similar price), the monuments erected for the notable dead are usually larger, taller and of higher quality than those which surround them, which are themselves more prominent than average for the cemetery.

5.3.3 Grouping of graves

At Père Lachaise there are a number of clear groupings of 'kindred spirits' within the cemetery for example the rendezvous des braves with a concentration of military figures. We know that the example of Père Lachaise in that regard was also followed elsewhere including at the Invalidenfriefhof in Berlin and the cemetery at Mainz, both of which see officers buried alongside private soldiers. These cemeteries and also the groupings at Père Lachaise were probably known to Chadwick when writing his report. He suggested that National Cemeteries should contain areas dedicated to specific crafts, trades and professions (Curl 2001d, 122). Kensal Green also saw the draw of famous or kindred figures with demand for burial plots close to the Duke of Sussex and his sister (Curl 2001e, 137). Therefore, it should not be surprising that there are also a number of examples of similar groupings at Highgate Cemetery.

In the Old Ground/West Cemetery, one example is the choice of location for Tom Sayers, opposite John Atcheler the highly successful horse slaughterer who had been his friend and patron when he was a pugilist. The choice of animal statues for both graves gives them further synergy.

There is a clear grouping of graves in the area which is known as 'White Eagle Hill' where in addition to the grave of Polish exiles Stanislaus Worcell (HGW8.1), Albert Darasz and Charles Stolzman, there are also several other Polish names and a plaque commemorating the 'the Polish soldiers who fought for the freedom of Poland against the Russian occupation in November 1830-31' in the centre of the area (See Appendix – HGW8).

There is also an artistic grouping, with the Rossetti family grave lying next to that of Elizabeth Madox Brown, first wife of Ford Madox Brown, however as well as being 'kindred spirits' with ornate gothic gravestones of a similar style, they were also relatives – with Elizabeth Madox Brown being the mother-in-law of William Michael Rossetti and grandmother of Gabriel Arthur Madox Rossetti who were later buried in the adjoining plot.

Another similar grouping occurs in the New Ground/East Cemetery where George Eliot's grave is close to that of her late lover George Henry Lewes, and the adjacent plot to hers is taken by Elma

Stuart who according to the inscription was 'for 8 ½ blessed years George Eliot called by the sweet name of daughter' (See Appendix – HGE3).

However, the recording technique which appeared successful at Père Lachaise in detecting groupings of 'kindred spirits' by looking at the surrounding graves for each 'notable' burial, is shown to have limitations here, where a wider recording sample, rather than a tight focus on notable burials, would have also allowed the sample to include John Chapman – the publisher of Westminster Review where George Eliot was an editor, and other progressive thinkers of the time including their friend Henry Crabb Robinson (founder of University College London) and George Jacob Holyoake who contributed to Lewes magazine and a fearless atheist. Robinson's friend Edwin Wilkins Field is also buried in this section. Figure 86 shows this grouping.

This grouping shows the potential for spotting additional groupings where large datasets can be gathered, which might become more feasible thanks to new cemetery mapping technology where sufficient funding is available (see Chapter 9 for discussion). We also know that Herbert Spencer (HGE10.1), buried nearby in the East Cemetery was friend and influence on Eliot's beliefs and writing. Other Victorian freethinkers in the New Ground are more scattered through the unconsecrated section – including the original location of Karl Marx's grave (HGE4.1) and the graves of Ernestine Rose (HGE5.1) and Edward Truelove (HGE8.1).

5.3.4 Location restrictions

Although at 1st glance, it looks as though grave owners were free to choose any plot when purchasing, due to the lack of sequential grave numbering which shows that plots were not sold in order along rows, some restrictions would have existed. Not least in that some areas were not available for burial initially as the cemetery was extended both within the Old Ground and also with the addition of the New Ground.

An analysis of the 'notable' burials where the memorial is of known date and the date of the memorial corresponds to the 1st burial in the plot (58 out of sample of 71 notable burials), and those surrounding them which fit the same criteria shows that over half (55%) of the notable burials are earlier than the median date for that area, 19% have a date which matches the median date and only 26% are later (Figure 87). This shows that within the use of these areas for burials, the notable burials are more likely than not represent an early use of that area for internment.

This tends to indicate that grave owners arranging the burial of notable people had a marked tendency to be innovative when choosing a grave location. We can imagine that perhaps these locations were chosen to ensure they had purchased what was perceived to be the best of what was available, even if that area was currently sparsely utilised. Larger plots on pathways were more expensive than other graves, so early adoption may show that these grave owners had both a greater ability to purchase these graves and more willingness to pay for the prestigious locations than other grave owners and so tended to cluster in these high value areas at a relatively early date. There might also have been a specific tendency to seek out areas which were as yet uncrowded in order to give their memorials a greater feeling of individuality and prominence.

A brief look at the burial registers (London Cemetery Company 1839 onwards) reveals that the price of each plot seems to be largely dependent on the size (and that there was not an additional charge for the initial purchase of deeper graves), and that standard 6'6" x 2'6" graves remained available for a basic price of £3.3.0 until at least 1923, but that in some areas of the cemetery a grave this size commanded a higher price e.g. a 6'6" x 2'6" plot on the Terrace above the catacombs was £10.10.0 in 1857 (Westbeech HGW10.2) and £11.11.00 in 1861 (Cross HGW10.1).

Larger plots came with an additional cost with standard sizes of 6'6" x 2'10" starting at £4.9.0 and 6'6" x 3' starting at £6.6.0. Bricked Graves were considerably more expensive with the smallest of 9' x 4' starting at £15.15.0 (e.g. Bunning 1863, HGW15.1) and then rising to £21.0.0 (e.g. Wibberley 1868 HGW15.4), with larger plots 9' x 6'6" starting at £31.10.0. There are also examples of bricked graves in some areas costing more – such as the 9' x4' plot for the Field family (HGW51.3) costing £45.0.0 in 1889 (when other plots this size were still sold for £21.0.0) because of its location in Square 11, next to the steps down into the Circle of Lebanon (figure 88).

A full analysis of the burial ledgers was beyond the scope of this thesis, but these samples do show that both the cemetery authorities and those purchasing graves placed a monetary value on the amount of space occupied in the cemetery, and where this space was. It would be interesting to undertake a full analysis to find the average cost of the notable graves in comparison to the average for plots at that time (see Chapter 10), but this small analysis supports the above assertions that there was a willingness to pay more for larger and more desirable plots for the notable dead.

Another fact which clearly has the potential for grave location restriction is that some areas of the cemetery were consecrated and others unconsecrated, which reduced choice of plot as this was an important theological distinction for many people – in fact the ability to bury in unconsecrated ground was a primary motivation for the founding of a number of cemeteries by non-conformists, for example at Key Hill Cemetery in Birmingham (McKenna 1992). Therefore, we investigated how important this appears to have been when choosing the locations for 'notable' burials at Highgate Cemetery.

While we cannot say with certainty which faith was practiced (if any) by the entire sample of 'notable burials', but documentary evidence – for example place of marriage, minister officiating at funeral, own written works gives us a known religious affiliation for 35 out of the 72 graves. Of these 24 are

There are a small number of unexpected results, where people are buried in areas which appear to be in conflict with their known beliefs – for example Joseph Hodgson was a Quaker and yet is buried in consecrated ground, as is Leslie Stephen who was Agnostic, but there are no Anglicans in unconsecrated ground, and broadly the pattern is as would be expected. It seems that access to unconsecrated ground for burial was initially less important to the London elite who chose Highgate, and that some (including the cemetery's own architect Stephen Geary who was devoted to the Temperance movement) did not consider their religious beliefs when selecting a plot, perhaps because they were long accustomed to accepting burial in consecrated churchyards. This may have become more important over time as a larger and more equally appointed area of the East Cemetery is left unconsecrated, suggesting higher demand and less willingness to be 'tucked away'. This area would then be an important locale within the cemetery, known for the burial of freethinkers including George Eliot, Karl Marx and Herbert Spencer.

5.4 Investigating the wider effects of 'notable burials on cemetery landscape

This thesis is primarily focused on the direct effects of 'notable burials' on the graves in their immediate locale through the collection of data on the 'surrounding graves', some of which has already been discussed above in section 5.2.3 with the groupings of 'kindred spirits' and those who knew each other in life such as friends and relatives. However, the wider study of the chronological development of the cemetery landscape also allows some of the wider effects of the 'notable' dead on the cemetery landscape to be investigated.

Some of these effects are direct, for example the construction of the Beer Mausoleum, changed the way in which people were able to move around the cemetery, by leading to the loss of the original staircase from the Circle of Lebanon and the construction of two new staircases to the East and West. However, most of the effects are more indirect, either through the creation of focal points within the cemetery (for example the Otway Mausoleum (HGW7.1) and other large monuments around Comforts Corner (e.g. Wyatt HGW12.1) or by generally raising the public profile of the cemetery and ensuring it remained popular both as a place to be buried and as a place for visiting. Some of the funerals held at Highgate Cemetery in the 19th century, for example for Tom Sayers, attracted large numbers of attendees and subsequent visitors. The cluster of 'free-thinkers' in the Unconsecrated section of the East Cemetery/New Ground, shows that the burial of some individuals could lead the cemetery to become associated with certain schools of thought and thus an appropriate place for the burial of others with the same views.

5.5 Summary

This chapter was an exploration of the development of the landscape of Highgate cemetery from 1839-1914 including changes to the original West cemetery and the creation of the newer East Cemetery. The location of the sample graves within this landscape and the factors which may have determined the choice of plot and orientation are considered, including visibility, the pathway network, plot size and groupings of 'kindred spirits', whilst considering the restrictions placed on these choices by the cemetery administrators. The direct and indirect impact of the graves of 'notable' individuals is considered both on their immediate surroundings and in a wider cemetery context. Having discussed the landscape of both cemeteries, the comparison of the data can be found in Appendix 4. The subsequent chapters turn to a consideration of monumentality, beginning with Père Lachaise in Chapter 6.

Chapter Six - Monumentality Analysis at Père Lachaise

6.1 Introduction

Having looked in detail at the landscape of the cemetery and the context of the grave, this chapter now turns its attention in greater detail to the monuments raised to the deceased in those locations. Firstly, wider trends affecting monument styles, types and materials will be discussed before turning to a comparison of the monumentality of the 25 'notable' graves with the surrounding graves and a random sample, also of 25 graves. The background sample is illustrative of the wider picture at Père Lachaise, as observed by the author, but is not a statistically significant sample, because it is a tiny fraction of those buried in this cemetery.

6.2 Typical monumentality and chronological development up to 1914

The sample taken at Père Lachaise is small and therefore in order to have an idea of how this compares to wider trends in the cemetery, Paris and France more widely, this chapter begins with a discussion of the factors which may have affected monumentality; attitudes to death, religious belief and stylistic changes during the period 1804-1914. There will also be consideration of the materials available to monumental masons and the bereaved when choosing the memorial, as the material chosen also affects the styles of monument which are executed.

6.2.1 attitudes to death and religion in the 19th and early 20th century France

Attitudes to death which emerged in the 19th century were rooted in a specific social, religious and political context. Decisions about funerals reflect public as well as private meanings, and monuments in garden cemeteries like Père Lachaise serve both public and private functions simultaneously.

Ariès states that in the 19th century the focus of death shifted from self to the separation from others especially family, and the expectation of heavenly reunion (Ariès 1981, 442). Although Kselman points out that much of his evidence for the 19th century rests of the memoir of Le Ferronays family and acknowledges the criticisms of Ariès work, he also values it for the sensitivity with which the emotions of the bereaved are treated and the way it highlights the importance of family affection (1993, 4), something which is borne out by his own research. Where Ariès has been criticised for sweeping generalisations, Kselman takes a very detailed approach using a variety of sources to study in detail funerary practices of Paris and the Maine-de-Loire region of France (Kselman 1993, 11).

In order to create cemeteries which would meet the hygienic but also aesthetic standards for the cult of the dead, it was important to remove burial from the centre of towns. This not just for public health reasons, but also to create an appropriate relationship between the living and the dead (Kselman 1993, 167). Nature was viewed as a regenerative force and macabre imagery of death was rejected (Kselman 1993, 168). The creation of cemeteries as landscape gardens and 'sleeping places' for the dead, where nature was embellished by artistic monuments was aimed to create an 'Arcadian' or 'Elysian' space which would provide a contrast to the previous horrors of churchyards. The theory was that cemeteries where death appeared tamed as merely an eternal sleep, could be catalysts for the ideals of the revolution with reason, tender feelings and philanthropy the replacing terror and superstition associated with ghoulish Christian imagery of death (Curl 2000, 24-25).

Therefore, the role of religion in cemeteries was less certain, but by the beginning of the 19th century the state tolerated, even if it didn't encourage, the expression of Christian sentiment and doctrine (Kselman 1993, 167). This was in part due to public reactions to treatment of the dead following the Revolution. Although the national cult of the dead can be considered to have begun with the enshrinement of heroes in the Panthéon, this period was widely characterised by indifference to the dead and neglect of cemeteries, which was considered part of a general moral crisis (Kselman 1993, 168). Therefore, the state thought it wise to allow people to express hopeful illusions about death in cemeteries (Kselman 1993, 169).

Folk beliefs and practices existed alongside Catholic belief in this era, which also saw a shift in Catholic doctrine; one where the threat of Hell was increasingly reserved for those outside the church. The political situation made the role of the church at this time complex and changed the way the clergy were able to mediate between the living and the dead. The money earned from masses was a sensitive issue that made them vulnerable to anticlerical attack. One way in which this changing relationship between the Church and death is characterised is a shift in what the Middle Classes saw as an ideal death - now the importance of family at the deathbed outweighed the importance of last rites; the dying wanted to devote their final moments to familial sentiment (Kselman 1993, 97). In fact, the presence of a clergyman could be seen as intrusive into a personal moment which might be more about family harmony rather than salvation. For 'Great Men' there was also another dimension to the deathbed – the press would report daily medical bulletins and the house where he lay dying would become a place of pilgrimage, both for the masses who waited outside to show concern, admiration and curiosity, and the elite who would visit the house and perhaps even be admitted to the bedchamber. Thus, we go from the 'Good Death' of the Middle Ages to the 'Romantic Death' where the religious aspect, even for Catholics, was less important than the end of the bravely fought struggle against death, taking place amidst the loving family. It was both horrible and beautiful (Ben-Amos 2000, 280).

Some people favoured civil funerals over religious ones, but most men and women still found it impossible face death without Catholic ritual at funerals, which provided familiarity, consolation and reassurance that their separation was a temporary one (Kselman 1993, 110). Atheists like Auguste Blanqui, who rejected the possibility of an afterlife, were still rare in 19th century France (Kselman 1993, 135). Some famous freethinkers actually underwent deathbed conversions, and these were considered great triumphs by the Catholic church (Ben-Amos 2000, 283).

The clergy were politicised because of their concern about preserving public morals and the salvation of souls - they had a political stake in the afterlife. Therefore, anticlericals needed to define new and consoling relationships between the living and the dead if they hoped to replace Catholic doctrines. Liberals, socialists and positivists all proposed alternative afterlives suggesting either personal immortality or survival in the collective memory as part of their models of society (Kselman 1993, 7), and like Catholics they understood morality as linked to attitudes about the dead (Kselman 1993, 8).

The cult of the dead which was so characteristic of France in this period, was heavily politicised and funerals and monuments to the illustrious dead were used to legitimise successive regimes and as rallying cries for change by those in opposition. These practices were used to enshrine these figures in the national memory (Ben-Amos 2000, 1-13). Usually it was individual 'Great Men' but sometimes the collective dead, for example those who died fighting for Second Republic in 1848 who would be admitted to 'posterity' (Ben-Amos 2000, 266). The honour was usually conferred immediately upon death through the celebration of a state funeral, but sometimes people were admitted late to this exclusive and influential community, such as Zola who was transferred to the Pantheon several years after his death (Ben-Amos 2000, 267).

However the cult of the dead was not just about 'Great Men', it was also part of the fabric of family life and for the ordinary people of Paris the visit to the cemetery was a favourite excursion on rest days and a source of comfort in times of distress (Ariès 1981, 539). The purchase and maintenance of a family grave, as a 'place to visit, the goal of a pilgrimage designed for prayer and mediation' was sought after by an increasing number of families and caused the huge proliferation of small mausoleums (which Ariès calls chapel tombs) in the later 19th century (Ariès 1981, 536).

Cemeteries were a place where the living and the dead could be united, they helped create a sense of community and solidarity towards the city or France more widely, especially through monuments which commemorated tragedy or war, for example after the Franco-Prussian War and later WWI. These monuments became central to the civil religion of modern France, used to reinforce republican and nationalist sentiments. Kselman believes that the power of Monuments aux Morts to evoke these sentiments is built on the previous experience of French men and women had of visiting the cemetery and family graves (1993, 214).

A final influence on practice at this time was the funeral trade, which compelled people to put a price on the priceless dead (Kselman 1993, 288). It was not so much the direct influence of commercial funerals, but the competition between market and non-market forces that shaped attitudes towards death. This struggle, which was complicated by religious and political considerations, was centred on the dead and their families (Kselman 1993, 288). Ostentatious funerals became an important status symbol for the upper bourgeoisie, and 'display of riches' so frowned upon in life became 'an obligation after death' (Ben-Amos 2000, 284). Mourning and funeral ceremony were subject to a strict financial and social hierarchy which constrained behaviour and the class of funeral accessories (Ben-Amos 2000, 284). This display of wealth continued after the funeral through the choice of monuments.

6.2.2 Style movements and their chronological development in funerary monuments 1804-1914

According to Kselman the 'impressive monuments raised by affluent members of the bourgeoisie' (1993, 205) show evidence of changing sensibilities, through a shift in style and ornamentation. During the 19th century archaeological discoveries and historical monuments had a great deal of influence on architecture in general, but especially on public architecture and funerary monuments (Parker Pearson 1982: 106). This can be seen at Père Lachaise with many monuments inspired by famous buildings and objects from the Classical World, Egypt and Medieval Europe. The main architectural styles in the 19th century which were inspired by the past were Egyptian, Greek, Roman and Gothic, which all experienced revivals. This chapter will also discuss some other influences on memorial styles during the period.

In the early part of the 19th century, the 18th century taste for classical style continued, and so there are many tombs modelled on Greek and Roman temples. Urns and wreaths are fashionable motifs, as are broken columns, especially for the graves of young women. This provides a contrast in decoration between the small wooden and metal crosses of the poor and the stone monuments of the wealthy (Kselman 1993, 205). Although there are also some relatively modest stone monuments which have a horizontal cross on the top of the slab in this era (Kselman 1993, 206).

Curl explains that the popularity of 'Greek and Roman prototypes…reinterpreted in this great French Necropolis' (2002, 156) was because of the associations which these architectural elements had at the time. 'The Neoclassical language of the tomb was fashionable and evocative and suggested the respectability of the antique' (Curl 2002, 156-157). In fact, many of the architectural inspirations for the movement were from funerary sources, including the influence which drawings by Piranesi had on members of the French Academy – he was obsessed by Greek Doric columns, ash-chests, urns and tombs (Curl 2002, 192) and did detailed drawings of many (e.g. Figure 90), often depicting them at an exaggerated scale (Curl 2002, 192) which added to the feeling of awe they inspired. There are several direct copies of the monuments he depicted at Père Lachaise (see Figure 91).

Curl suggests that at its essence the French Neoclassical style was about power and was a revolt against the delicate Rococo which had gone before (2002, 191). He states that Neoclassical architecture 'rejected the Rococo and a slavish copying of Antiquity. Unlike the Palladians and the Greek Revivalists, the Neoclassists used Antique forms and motifs with eclectic abandon and the greatest of freedom.' (Curl 2002, 192). In fact, this freedom was so great that the style combined symbolism not just from the Classical world as we know it, from Rome and Greece, but also many Egyptian influences. Mytum notes that many monuments 'combine features from a number of stylistic traditions' (2000, 3). In addition to his Roman sketches, Piranesi was also known for depictions of pyramids and obelisks, which appeared alongside his Roman sketches (Curl 2002, 192). There are several pyramids and many obelisks at Père Lachaise, plus other monuments which contain smaller elements of Egyptian symbolism (see Figure 92).

Napoleon's campaign in Egypt from 1798-1801 sparked widespread interest in Egyptian antiquities in France. Ancient Egypt became associated with funerary practice in the public consciousness because of the highly publicized discoveries of tombs, mummies and rich material culture surrounding death. However, the Neoclassical interest in Egyptian art and aesthetic had already began much earlier, with works by Comte de Caylus in 1752, Piranesi in 1769 and Quartremère de Quincy in 1784, all of which sparked interest in Pyramids, obelisks and Egyptian motifs among designers and architects in France (Curl 2002, 194). Even earlier, during the Renaissance Sphinxes and other Egyptian elements had been used in funerary architecture (Curl 2002, 194). In addition to the Napoleonic influence, another reason for the growth of Egyptianizing elements was the spread of Freemasonry, particularly among the intellectual class (Curl 2002, 173 & 194) which assigned fresh meaning to these ancient symbols.

There have also been Gothic memorials at Père Lachaise, since the beginning of the cemetery, including the Greffulhe chapel (1810) and the monument to Heloise and Abelard (1817) (see Figure 93), which was created using stonework from the Abbey at Paraclet where Abelard had been a monk. However gothic memorials were not as popular as Classical ones, particularly in the early 19th century, perhaps due to the association of this style with Catholicism at a time when anticlerical sentiment ran high. However, as we have seen above, the French did continue to seek the consolation of faith and prayer at funerals and in cemeteries. The popularity of the family mausoleum or chapel tomb (Ariès 1981, 536), with its small altar inside, was therefore a catalyst for an increase in gothic memorials in the cemetery.

By the middle of the 19th century these Neogothic chapels become popular (Kselman 1993, 205), and crosses are more commonly raised vertical on the tomb (Kselman 1993, 206). From the mid-19th century until the 1920s the cross in fact becomes the dominant symbol on monuments. Kselman suggests that the mid-century 'triumphant cross' reflected a self-conscious insistence on doctrine of death and resurrection (Kselman 1993, 207). Examples of both can be seen at Père Lachaise (see Figure 94).

Art Nouveau was a relatively short-lived style in architecture and design, which appears near the end of our period of study from the late 1880s onwards, reaching its peak in 1900 and declining after 1914. It was characterised by sinuous lines inspired by botantical forms and other natural forms. Art Nouveau was about freedom from past artistic traditions, and like the British Arts and Crafts movement, of which it was an outgrowth, it emphasised a move away from industrialised mass production and aimed to remove distinctions between fine art and the decorative arts. This style is particularly associated with France and was sometimes known in Paris as Le Style Métro after Guimard's Iron and Glass station entrances (Gontar 2006).

Although most widely seen in graphic and decorative art, particularly jewellery, there are some examples of buildings and interiors in the Art Nouveau style in Paris and therefore it is not surprising to find some monuments in this style at Père Lachaise, some of which are included in this study, plus some other fine examples (such as Figure 95).

The influence of Art Nouveau can be seen as surviving within Art Deco. Art Deco is an imprecise label referring to decorative arts and architecture created in the inter-war period, but it epitomised by the works shown at the Exposition Internationale des Arts Décoratifs et Industriels Modernes in Paris in 1925. A condition for inclusion in the exhibition was that all works must be without any imitation of historical styles. Abstract geometric decoration is prevalent, and human figures, animals, flowers and plants were popular motifs. Designers in France used new materials and techniques, many inspired by colonised countries in Africa and Asia to create luxurious finishes, such as exotic wood (Goss 2010). Art Deco memorials are found at Père Lachaise, some of which are in this study (e.g. Figure 96), although not within the 'notable' graves due to the cut-off date of 1914. After Art Nouveau and Art Deco we see the emergence of Modernist styles 'which emphasized function over form and the elimination of superfluous ornament' (Gontar 2006).

6.2.3 Material choices for monumental masonry during the 19th and early 20th centuries

When visiting Père Lachaise, the overall impression is of many memorials made from light-coloured stone, particularly where the ravages of 19th century air pollution and soot have been cleaned from the memorials. The most common stone chosen for memorials in this cemetery is pale-coloured limestone. Lutetian Limestone has been quarried in Paris and its environs since the Roman period (Horne 2002, 3) and was used extensively for buildings as well as monuments in the 19th century. The local origin of this limestone makes it both readily available and less expensive than stone which had to be transported for longer distances. The light, warm colour (which usually ranges from beige to yellow) and fine-grained texture are well suited to monument production, especially for inscribing epitaphs and producing carved details. However, the vulnerability of limestone to pollution, staining and especially dissolution from acid rain (Kirk and Cook, no date), means that in the 20th century many of these monuments have deteriorated. Another disadvantage is that as a relatively soft stone, the long-term structural integrity is lower than for harder materials.

As the 19th century progresses, there is a greater prevalence of imported stone; in particular, Italian marble (Bochicchio 2012), as well as granite and similar volcanic rocks. This is due to improved techniques in quarrying, transporting and cutting these harder materials which made them more affordable and accessible to a larger number of Parisians, although still more expensive than local options. The weight of stone meant that 19th century technological improvements in shipping and railway transport reduced time and cost of delivery. The tools for cutting and polishing also improved and allowed mass production on a scale which was previously unknown (Lightfoot 2019).

Marble was desirable because it shares many of the advantages of limestone for carving, but the metamorphic nature of the rock means that the layers found in sedimentary rock are not present and so it has a more uniform texture. Also, the luminous quality of the stone, the variety of colours available and its traditional use for classical sculpture made it highly desirable for funerary statuary. However, marble suffers from the same vulnerabilities to pollution as limestone, and it is not common to find marble memorials which appear entirely black or where all surface detail has been eroded away. Preservation is much better inside mausoleums and so on where the marble has been protected from the elements to a greater extent (Kirk and Cook, no date).

Italian marble, especially Carrara marble, was highly prized because of the association with the Roman past. Italy boasted a great many craftspeople with the technical ability to create marble sculpture in the 19th century, who were part of a long-established artistic tradition, but with access to new techniques for cutting and polishing. Many of these sculptors were not strictly artists in their own right, but copyists recreating the designs of others or popular Classical pieces. There was also export of semi-finished marble pieces from Italy which would be completed upon arrival to meet local requirements. Blocks of marble for building were also exported in large quantities. The growth of Italian shipyards and improved ship design benefitted not only passenger transport, which had driven the changes, but also merchant shipping as well throughout the 19th century, but particularly the last quarter when steamships were introduced (Bochicchio 2012, Lightfoot 2019).

Granite, and other igneous rocks are not well suited to the production of statuary but are ideal suited for the creation of architectural elements. The distinctive colour, especially of pink granites and black igneous rocks, makes them stand out in the cemetery landscape. Those looking at the memorials would have known that this stone was expensive and therefore the use also added prestige. The ability to create highly polished surfaces allows inscriptions and carved details to appear clearly for viewers, especially if the letters are painted (although this effect is not often visible in photographs – when details of these memorials may be very difficult to perceive). These stone types are harder and more durable than marble, being much less prone to damage from pollution, resulting in many of the best-preserved monuments. The main vulnerability is that, due to weight, these monuments are often made in pieces. The joints are therefore a source of instability, especially if the ground sinks due to grave settling or disruption by tree roots occurs. It is not uncommon to see granite memorials where pieces have fallen or shifted (see Figure 97).

Figure 97 Papeil family memorial made from grey granite with marble and bronze decorations. The granite cross has fallen (probably due to people climbing on the grave which is next to Oscar Wilde's tomb (Photo J Wall 2016)

Granite was a major British export in the 19th century, with quarries in several regions of Scotland (especially around Aberdeen) but also Devon, Cornwall and Cumbria (Hyslop and Lott 2007). The hardness of granite made cutting difficult, but technological advancements including sandblasting techniques, the use of carborundum as an abrasive and eventually pneumatic drilling in the1890s allowed increased exports. Improvements in railway transport also increased availability of granite by decreasing shipping costs (Lightfoot 2019).

The stone which is often called 'black granite' is not a granite at all. These memorials are actually usually made of Gabbro or Larvikite, other types of igneous rock which are both dark in colour, appearing black when polished. Gabbro is more evenly grained, while Larvikite contains larger crystals. Dark coloured igneous rocks for memorials are very unusual in 19th century Europe, because most of the 20th century examples use a type of Gabbro which is imported from South Africa. However, Larvikite began to be quarried in Norway on a large scale towards the end of the 19th century (Kirk and Cook, no date).

Other materials include wood, bronze and iron. Small wood or iron grave markers could be cheaply produced and were ideal for temporary concessions and even public graves, but if the surface is not treated regularly, they quickly become vulnerable to rot and rust respectively making these materials less suitable for permanent concessions. However, many graves were also enclosed using these materials. At Père Lachaise, engravings show wickerwork fences around some graves, others have surviving iron doors or railings. Iron was often painted to increase their lifespan; green paint was popular. Bronze statues, busts and decorations are relatively common, but represent a significant expense. The green oxidation of copper forms a relatively stable layer which protects from further deterioration making this an ideal material for outdoor memorials (Lightfoot 2019). Figure 98 is an example of a memorial at Père Lachaise with both bronze and iron elements.

6.3 Monumentality and chronological development of sample graves

Now that some of the wider trends in Monumentality have been considered, the detailed analysis of the sample graves will begin, considering architectural style, form, materials, motifs and inscriptions. First however, the condition of the sample graves must be examined – as the condition of the memorials will determine what other analysis is possible.

6.3.1 Condition

The condition of memorials at in the Père Lachaise sample was generally very good, with over 88% of the monuments being in sound and in place. There were only a handful of overgrown or partially overgrown graves, and less than 8% graves with significant damage. None of the 'notable' graves were damaged.

The reason for this is partly due to restoration work which has been undertaken on many of the graves – which is often recorded by plaques on the memorials (see Figure 99). Restoration work to keep memorials in top condition is necessary because of cemetery policy – long-term untended memorials, even on perpetual concessions, result in the grave been cleared for reuse. Therefore, we get a strong preservation bias towards memorials which remain socially active and attract public visits. This may explain why the mean date of the entire sample is 1880, but for the famous sample it is 1854.

The preservation of inscriptions is much poorer than the preservation of the memorials, with almost 29% being damaged or obscured in some way. This is almost entirely due to the high proportion of limestone and marble for memorials in the cemetery, which are extremely susceptible to damage due to air pollution and acid rain. Protection from the elements means that the best preservation of inscriptions at Père Lachaise is inside mausoleums. Sadly, these inscriptions are not always visible without entering the mausoleum, depending on the construction and condition of the door. There is also some obstruction of inscriptions due to vegetation, in particular moss on ledger style memorials (e.g. Figure 100).

Another factor in preservation is not solely the material chosen for a monument, but the combination of materials used (see 6.3.4 and 7.3.4). Robinson warns of the dangers of placing stones which have varying capacities to absorb and give off moisture alongside each other, resulting in frost damage and that 'quite simple limestone set against sandstone or either stone placed against granite will, in time, fail.' (2001, 284). Given the pattern of material choice discussed below it is perhaps especially fortunate that monuments erected for 'notable' persons are more likely to receive restoration.

6.3.2 Style

The vast majority of the sample memorials at Père Lachaise are broadly 'Classical' (see Figure 101), which fits with the popularity of this style for French architecture and memorials. These memorials range from those with extremely clear Classical elements like Mausoleums with Corinthian columns, pedimented headstones, or columns topped by urns, to much plainer styles which have a broadly Classical influence e.g. Round topped headstones are thought to be linked to Romanesque revival (Mytum 2000, 12). In the total sample there are 11 graves whose style cannot be determined due to the level of damage/obstruction by vegetation. Of the 233 whose style could be determined, nearly 75% were Classical, increasing to 77% if Egyptian style memorials are included in this category, which could well be considered justified because French Neoclassical architecture often freely combines Roman, Greek and Egyptian elements (see section 6.1.2).

In the sample there is one memorial whose style is influenced by Chinese design and has an inscription in Mandarin. There are two Art Nouveau memorials and one Art Deco memorial, whose dates, where known, fit with what is expected for these style movements. The choice of an Art Nouveau memorial for Ocsar Wilde is especially appropriate given the influence which the Art Nouveau illustrations for Salomé had on the style. Victor Noir died in 1870, but the memorial was commissioned 20 years later, explaining this discrepancy.

Of the remaining memorials, Gothic (21 memorials) and Modern (17 memorials) are the most common styles. There are two memorials whose design includes ringed or Celtic crosses as a key feature. In Ireland, the use of Celtic crosses was linked to a Celtic revival with wider cultural and political significance. According to Mytum, similar designs in other countries did not carry 'the same intensity of meaning' (2000, 20) and therefore in France these could be grouped together with the Gothic memorials, as the Celtic cross is likely to have been chosen largely for its Christian symbolism.

The popularity of these two styles over time are charted in figure 102. Although it would not be sensible to draw definitive conclusions from of sample of 32 graves (some were excluded as they were of unknown date) it is interesting that even with a small data set we see the expected pattern of Gothic being more popular in the second half of the 19th century and Modernism appearing after the Second World War.

The style of memorials chosen for the 'notable' people is even more homogenous than the wider sample, in fact 21 out of the 25 are Classical in style (and 1 Egyptian), which plus the 2 Art Nouveau memorials mentioned above, leaves only the Gothic Memorial to Heloise and Abelard, moved to Père Lachaise in 1819, but constructed using original Medieval stonework.

This is unsurprising given that those who were considered 'Great Men' in France during this period, whether religious or not, were emphasised for their civic virtues and thus memorials which are more public facing are less likely to be made in a Gothic, overtly Catholic, style. There are no Art Deco or Modern style memorials in the 'notable' sample as those styles were not seen pre-1914.

6.3.3 Form

The memorials at Père Lachaise show a huge diversity of form, with everything from flat ledger slabs and low memorials, through to huge mausoleums. Each form is given an individual code, adapted from Mytum's classification (2000) but they can be broadly divided into 5 main categories as shown in table 7.

Table 7 Classification of memorial forms

Form	Code	Description
Low monuments	0100-0900	Ledger slabs, low monuments and low monuments on a stepped base, also kerbs as a primary monument
Chest Tombs	1000	Chest and table tombs
Crosses	2000	Crosses with stepped or rocky bases, not those on tombs or headstones
Headstones etc.	4000-8000	Includes modern memorials types e.g. rocky monolith, desk with bible, scroll
Pedestal tombs	9000-9400	Taller than a chest tomb, usually taller than they are wide/long.
Mausoleums	9800	Buildings created as monuments and as a place to visit e.g. with altar for prayer

As table 8 shows the most common monument form in the whole sample from Père Lachaise are Pedestal tombs, and tombs in general (adding chest tombs) make up just over 40% of the monuments. The second most common grave type are headstones, which is interesting because according to Mytum this is unusual because we would usually expect headstones to be 'by far the most common form of memorial' (2000, 109). Perhaps this discrepancy is due to differences between French and British practice or reflects the elite nature of Père Lachaise and the sample, causing a higher proportion of the plots to be covered by a larger and more expensive memorial type. Other common monument forms in this sample are Mausoleums and low monuments – most of which are those raised slightly on a base or step.

Table 8 Monument forms in Père Lachaise sample

Form	Total sample	Notable	Surrounding	Random
Low monuments	43	2	33	8
Chest Tombs	21	2	19	0
Crosses	2	0	1	1
Headstones etc.	47	1	41	5
Pedestal tombs	80	16	59	5
Mausoleums	45	4	35	6
Total	238	25	188	25

The 'notable' graves are skewed even more heavily towards the pedestal tomb type, with almost 65% of them being this basic form. This is probably because pedestal tombs, which can be topped with obelisks, columns, statues etc. are the most diverse and eye-catching memorial form. Conversely, the random sample is skewed more heavily towards low monuments which is probably because these less ostentatious monuments seem to be more popular in the 20th century.

As well as the memorial itself, many graves have extra elements such as railings or bases which cover a larger area. At Père Lachaise over 85% of graves (table 9) had some form of additional elements, because nearly every grave has a stone base visible around the monument, marking the full extent of the plot. This is sometimes not visible on older monuments, especially those away from paths where the edges of the grave plot are more likely to have become covered by soil.

Additional elements	Total	Notable	Surrounding	Random
Kerbs, railings etc.	22	4	18	0

Tomb height base/bodystone + kerb etc.	7	0	7	0

The 'notable' graves have a higher proportion of taller and more complex additional elements like railings and tomb-like bases, whereas the surrounding and especially random samples contains a high proportion of plain flat base slabs.

The visibility index scores calculated in section 4.2.2 showed that overall, the location and form of the monuments to famous individuals made them more eye-catching and distinctive than others in the sample data. This was partly due to the size and height of the memorials, which were both larger and taller.

Further analysis confirms this, as shown in table 10, where on average the 'notable' graves are larger in all dimensions, even when compared to those which surround them and would therefore be likely to belong to those with similar financial means. This holds true even when the extremely large mausoleum for Adolphe Thiers is removed from the average.

6.3.4 Materials

The entire sample contains 244 graves (figure 103), of which 176 (71%) are primarily made from the local limestone, which is what would be expected given that this locally available stone is easily carved to produce memorials. The other 29% are mostly made from imported stone, except for two memorials which are formed from flat concrete slabs (one of which is dated 2003, the other is undated but likely to be similarly modern). The most common imported stone types are white marble and grey granite.

For the ‘notable’ memorials, the proportion of imported stone is higher at 40%. Of the imported stone five are made from grey granite (20% of ‘notable’ graves), plus three white marble, one pink granite, one black igneous and one sandstone memorial (which is the only sandstone memorial in the whole sample). See figure 104 for full breakdown.

The random sample also has 32% imported stone (figure 105), but the mean date of the random sample is 1905, whereas the mean date of the ‘notable’ graves is 1854. The availability of imported stone increased, and the cost of purchasing decreased over time, making it more likely that the proportion of imported stone would increase over time. This is backed up by the fact that the earliest granite memorial in the random sample dates to 1881 and the other igneous stone memorials are all 20th century. In the ‘notable’ grave sample however, the first use of igneous stone, is grey granite for Gericault’s tomb in 1824 and all the others which can be dated were created in the 19th century. The use of grey granite for Ney (died 1815) monument is undated, because this is not his original monument and the date at which it was replaced is unknown.

When the additional materials used to construct parts of the memorials are included in the analysis, we can see that there are 174 monuments which are constructed from 2 or more materials, 90 which use 3 or more materials and 18 which use 4 different materials. The use of additional materials would have increased the expense of the monument. Therefore, it is interesting that of those memorials which use 4 different materials, 27% are from the 'notable' grave sample. It should also be noted that none of the 'notable' graves use fewer than 2 different materials. See table 11.

1 or more	244	25	194	25
2 or more	174	25	133	16
3 or more	90	18	61	11
4 materials	18	5	11	2

The most common additional material was iron which was used on 92 memorials. In addition to being used for railings around several memorials, iron was also used for other small elements including wreath hooks and plant pots. However, the largest use of iron was as doors on mausoleums. The next most used additional material was white marble, used on 71 memorials. In some cases, this was a sculptural element, but most commonly marble was being used as an insert for text panels, particularly inside mausoleums where they are well preserved. There is also substantial use of copper alloy (brass or bronze) elements, which were found on 51 of the memorials. Some are very small elements like wreath hooks or decorative studs holding text panels, but many, even small elements, were of a decorative nature – from small stars on headstones, all the way up to busts and full life-sized sculptures. In most of the other cases the additional materials were used for the base of the memorial – usually an igneous stone base on a limestone or marble memorial, perhaps in order to make the memorial more durable. See table 12 for full breakdown.

Ceramic	5	6	3
Iron	66	24	2
Copper Alloy	27	20	4
Limestone	11	1	1

When considering only the notable graves (table 13), 56% have iron elements, and 56% have copper alloy elements. The higher proportion of copper alloy than in the total sample is due to the large number of sculptures and busts, there are also more surviving iron railings surrounding these graves. There is also still a substantial proportion of white marble at 40%, many of which are also sculptural elements.

6.3.5 Motifs

Gravestones can be plain or highly decorated, with motifs which are purely aesthetic or loaded with meaning. Mytum's classification system divided them into 'main decorative motifs' and 'marginal decorative motifs' which are often architectural such as columns. His form allows for 3 of each, which has been expanded to 4 of each for this study, but this still led to some selection of the most important motifs being necessary especially on large mausoleums with decorative elements on all sides.

Before analysing the types of motifs, an overall look at the quantity of decoration on the different types of graves within the study and an examination of chronological patterns was conducted. Figure 106 shows that the 'notable' graves were more highly decorated than those which surrounded them, and that the surrounding graves were generally more decorated than the random sample, suggesting that desirable locations were often used for more decorative memorials and that the most decorative of all were for public figures. Any graves where the main motifs were unknown (e.g. due to damage or moss covered surfaced) were excluded from this analysis).

However, this does not take into account marginal decorative motifs (usually architectural features), Overall about 32% of the graves had at least 1 marginal motif, although only a very small number (7%) had more than 2. The 'notable' graves were more likely than those surrounding them to have marginal motifs, and both the 'notable' and surrounding graves were more likely to have between 1 and 3 marginal motifs when compared to the random sample. See table 14 for the full breakdown.

	No marginal motifs	1 marginal motif	2 marginal motifs	3 marginal motifs	4 marginal motifs
Total (229 graves)	155 (68%)	32 (14%)	25 (11%)	9 (4%)	8 (3%)
Notable (25 graves)	9 (36%)	5 (20%)	6 (24%)	4 (16%)	1 (4%)
Surrounding (129 graves)	126 (70%)	24 (13%)	18 (10%)	23 (13%)	6 (3%)
Random (25 graves)	20 (80%)	3 (12%)	1 (4%)	0 (0%)	1 (4%)

The lack of all kinds of decoration (main and marginal motifs) on the random sample graves is likely to be because of the wide date range and inclusion of later examples, as shown by this analysis which compares the level of decoration over time between the 'notable' graves and the random sample (figure 107). This data set is very small as a number of graves from both sets did not have a secure dating but overall, it does shows that whilst levels of decoration tended to decrease over time, where there was overlap between the samples, the level of decoration on the random sample was generally lower, so the comparative lack of decoration in the random sample is not solely due to date.

However, it is not just the amount of decoration, which is of interest, many decorative elements can tell us about what was considered important when commemorating the deceased. This analysis focuses only a selection of the main decorative motifs which are likely to have been chosen to convey a deliberate meaning rather than marginal motifs which are likely to be purely decorative. They are divided into six categories (see table 15).

Table 15 Summary of main motifs categories for analysis

Symbol type	Examples
Mortality	Winged hourglass, inverted torches, urns, mourning figures
Religion	Crosses, biblical scenes, angels, doves, passionflowers also non-Christian symbols e.g. Star of David
Images of the deceased	Full figures, busts, portrait carvings and photographs
Lineage and Nationality	Decorative initials, coats of arms, flags
Life and profession	Examples include lyre, paint pallet and other depictions of work or achievements
Vegetation, Animals etc.	Flowers, leaves and animals can have non-religious meanings e.g. roses for love, lions for courage

Each of these categories of motif will now be considered in turn to see what the symbolism can tell us about the sample graves.

Mortality

Although macabre symbols of mortality had fallen out of fashion before Père Lachaise opened, with skulls replaced by romantic symbols in the 18th century (Curl 2000, Mytum 2000), many of these symbols, often drawn from the classical repertoire, remained popular.

The most common symbol of mortality seen in Père Lachaise are wreaths, a Classical symbol associated with the laurel wreaths given to winning Olympians and conquering emperors. They represent victory and triumph over death. Wreaths appear 50 times in this sample, sometimes engraved on the stone or in the form of ceramic ornaments added to the grave. Another classical symbol seen often are urns – there are 20 of them, with and without draping, and they are meant to evoke the urns used for storing cremated remains in the Classical world.

We also see a number of hourglasses (with and without wings = 13 of them) which represent the fleeting nature of life, and burning torches (21 examples), often depicted as inverted which are symbols of eternal life.

The higher proportion of classical symbols of mortality on the graves of 'notable' individuals is no surprise. Although religious symbolism was potentially controversial in France after the Revolution, allusions to the classical world of Roman Empire and Greek civilisation were frequently used to legitimise a post-revolutionary France, where emphasising links to the past and longevity being especially important in times of great change.

Religious motifs

Of the 149 religious motifs in the sample, only 4 were non-Christian in origin- 3 Stars of David on Jewish graves and 1 small depiction of Buddha.

The most common religious motif in all the sample data were crosses – with 73 plain crosses and a total of 95 when other cross forms (Gothic, Maltese and Celtic) were included. There were small numbers of other religious motifs, usually inside mausoleums for example biblical scenes in the stained glass. Other motifs are even more subtle, although Mytum does not list them under Biblical symbols in his classification (2000, 125) Doves are widely understood as a symbol of peace because of their biblical associations with Noah's Ark. Passionflowers are another good example, which are named because of their resemblance to the crown of thorns (Keister 2004, 52).

As discussed above, the relationship between the French state and religion was complicated in the period covered by this study, but this data appears to back up Aries and Kselman's findings about tolerance of the bereaved expressing Christian sentiment and beliefs about death and the afterlife. It is interesting to note that although even most of those who had a state funeral during this period did have a church service or prayers as part of the ritual (Ben-Amos 2000) the 'notable' burials have a much smaller proportion of religious symbolism than the other graves in this sample. Perhaps other aspects of their identity were more important to emphasise in death. It is also possible that crosses were something of a 'default' if there was no strong sentiment against them or other motifs that the family was strongly drawn to, leading to a higher proportion in the rest of the sample.

Images of the deceased

In this sample there are 33 depictions of the deceased on gravestones, of which 12 are carved portraits, 2 photographs, 10 bust sculptures and 9 full sculptures (3 showing the deceased as they were in life, and 6 showing them in death). Of these none are in the random sample, and 15 of them just over 45% come from the 'notable' graves sample (2 are from the same memorial)– which means that 56% of those graves include an image of the person commemorated, an extraordinarily high proportion. Portraits and statues were clearly seen as important ways for ensuring these public figures entered posterity.

Lineage and Nationality

As well as 1 depiction of the French flag (on the grave of Felix Faure), there are a number of graves where a shield design is included to indicate a coat of arms – there are 8 in the sample, nearly all of which are on Military graves near Ney and Massena. There are also a number of graves which use the initials of the deceased or family group as a decorative element – often on railings or above the doors to mausoleums, suggesting pride in the family name. There are also a large number of graves which include titles in the inscription (see section 6.2.6).

Life and profession

Occupation had been commemorated on memorials in some burial grounds during the 18th century, notably both at South Park Street Cemetery in Calcutta, where many of the obelisks were carved with symbols representing the occupation of the deceased (Curl 2002, 142), and also in Scotland, such as trades depicted on monuments at Gorbals burial ground in Glasgow (Curl 2002, 149).

At Père Lachaise many graves include inscriptions which mention profession or other achievements (see section 6.2.6), but some graves also use motifs to depict this. The most common are Lyres for musicians, paint pallets for artists and books for writers – simple and easily distinguished visual clues. Some graves also include more elaborate scenes such as the bas reliefs of his paintings on Gericault's tomb (PLC7.1) and the engraving of the transportation of the obelisk on the Le Bas obelisk (PLC18.8).

The high proportion of motifs relating to professional achievements and lifetime accomplishments in the notable graves category is no surprise – once again helping to ensure their achievements enter the national memory.

Flora and Fauna etc.

This category are the symbols which do not have a collective meaning and are most easily dismissed as purely aesthetic, however it is worth noting that where they are depicted in a sufficiently lifelike way to be identified, many flowers and plants have meanings. Those which are most commonly identified with religious meanings have been discussed above, but other depictions at Père Lachaise include roses – associated with love, poppies – often associated with sleep, pinecones- associated with immortality and incorruptibility because they come from an evergreen tree and oak leaves- a symbol of strength, honour and liberty (Keister 2004).

In the Père Lachaise sample, the only depictions of Animals which have been noted are on the tomb of La Fontaine, and these have been reclassified as depictions of his profession as they are shown as part of scenes from his fables, however at Highgate cemetery there are also some animal depictions to consider for their symbolic and personal meaning (section 7.2.5).

6.3.6 Inscriptions

Not only was an individual grave, but also the marking of said grave with an epitaph was a right claimed by all for the first time nineteenth century France (Kselman 1993, 209). Epitaphs usually included name of deceased, date of death and a brief invocation, partly due to the limited space on simple crosses. Before this only a very limited section of society could hope to have an epitaph at all. For those that did, from the twelfth to fourteenth century these elements had already been important in epitaphs, but from the 15th to 18th centuries they also began to include other biographical details and references to family members. This tradition continues on the most elaborate tombs in the 19th century but declines over time (Kselman 1993, 209). At Aix-en-Provence from 1830-1860 27% of tombs built on perpetual concessions had biographical epitaphs, but between 1860-1890 that declined to 13% and by 1890-1920 only 6% included this information. Of those epitaphs which included biographical information, most contained references to family virtues. Civic virtues and socio-professional status are mentioned less frequently and decline through the century (Kselman 1993, 209).

Although 19th century epitaphs have been criticised for being sentimenal and banal, Kselman rightfully draws our attention to Ariès and the value he ascribes to them in their ability to express 'real and profound feeling' (Ariès 1984, 529).

Epitaphs for children are a clear example of this; used to console the living but also to sustain the grief of loss, allowing a continuing relationship between living parents and deceased child. This is also sometimes shown through statues which show the child with their eyes open (Kselman 1993, 212). Ariès argues that these are signs that 'the deaths of children were the first deaths that could not be tolerated'. Similarly, the tombs of husbands and wives may act as a place where death and separation are simultaneously acknowledged and denied (Kselman 1993, 212).

The decline of biographical details and other elaborate epitaphs may be linked to the increasing importance of the tomb as a family gathering place. Evocation of an individual person is better suited to a single grave but on a family memorial, multiple names will fill the space instead (Kselman 1993, 212).

The epitaphs which remain most common in the 19th century are the name of the deceased accompanied by a short invocation to pray. At cemetery of St Jean in Orleans 51% of inscriptions from 1808 to 1824 included a traditional appeal: Pray for him "Priez pour lui" Pray for his soul "Priez pour son Ame" Pray to God for the repose of his soul "Priez Dieu pour le repos de son Ame" Rest in Peace "Requiescat in Pace"

These requests for prayer seem not to be tied to Catholic belief in Purgatory, but simply related to the desire to remember, the connection between prayer and remembrance of the dead became a central characteristic of the visit to the cemetery (Kselman 1993, 213).

The analysis of the inscriptions in the same at Père Lachaise focused on 4 parts of the inscription- phrase used to introduce the person or family, the terminology used to describe death, the relationships commemorated on memorials and any epitaphs or additional information given.

Introductory phrases

The analysis of those phrases which are used at the beginning of inscriptions was limited to inscriptions of known date, so that any chronological variations would be revealed. This meant removing from the sample all graves with no date listed and those where the date was uncertain due to damage. The graves of La Fontaine, Moliere, Heloise and Abelard were not included in the sample because their dates of death fell outside the studied period and were likely to reflect older phraseology. The sample included 453 people who died between 1800-1919. There were within this data set 6 phrases which appeared on only 1 monument and thus no chronological pattern could be studied for those phrases (sacred to the memory of, le corps de, la coeur de, reposent ensemble, oui le and les restes precieux), but battleship curves have been produced for any wording which appeared more than once, as shown in Figure 109.

The data reveals that the use of 'famille' as an inscription is the most popular in all time periods and also increases over time, which fits well with what Aries and Kselman have observed about the huge and growing importance of family graves and the cult of the dead. The second most popular phrase used was 'ici repose' which translates as 'here reposes', which has connotations of rest and sleep, this is more popular in all time periods than 'sépulture' with its direct illusion to the tomb. The wording 'ci-gît' (here lies) is a phrase which doesn't appear after 1889, perhaps gradually being replaced with the very simple 'À' (To) which doesn't appear before 1870. Although never very popular 'à la memoire' (to the memory) is a phrase which appears to remain in use throughout the period of study.

Death terminology/Mortality phrases

Of the above sampled people with known date of death there were 446 for whom a word of phrase in the inscription referring to their dead could be read or for whom it was clear that the inscription did not intend to use any such term (e.g. dates only 1800-1881). The battleship curves for all wording which appeared on more than one gravestone can be found in figure 110.

The general trend over time is that the use of the phrase 'décédé' or the feminine 'décédée' (deceased) decreases over time, whilst there is a general increase in the number of graves where dates of death are stated without any wording. At all times the word 'mort' (died) or variations on the verb 'mourir' (to die or to perish) are less commonly found than the softer and more euphemistic 'décédé'. There are also two graves which use the verb 'dormir' (to sleep). There were also a number of terms excluded from figure 22 because they appeared on only one grave. They were departed this life, died, tué (killed), assassinat (assassinated), 'appele à Dieu' (called to God) and 'obiit' (Latin – died). This sole use of the Latin term appears on the grave of Rose Legendre (PLC5.5) whose graves is adjacent to those of La Fontaine and Molière which also use Latin inscriptions.

Relationships

The way people are described in relation to others on memorials can give us a clue about the family, personal and professional relationships which their loved ones wanted to remember them by. These inscriptions can help us to piece together the links which connects those listed on the stone and explaining why they might be buried or commemorated together. Sometimes these are given in relation to the first person buried in a grave, but more usually for family graves they are related to the father and husband as head of the family. In the Père Lachaise sample we also have other reasons stated why people are commemorated together including a memorial to victims of a plane crash (PLC40) or Claude Martin Lecomte and Jacques Leonard Clement-Thomas who were 'assassinated' on the 18th March 1871 during the Paris Commune and whose funeral and monument were mandated by the National Assembly (PLC18.7).

Of the 1,004 people for whom inscriptions, or traces of inscriptions can be read in the Père Lachaise sample, there are 173 people for whom a relationship to others is stated, of these 159 are women. Most commonly women are identified as wives (75 inscriptions) by the use of the title 'Madame' (often abbreviated M^{ME}) or by an inscription which included their husband's name, for example 'Marthe Ledoux épouse d'Adolphe Fould' (PLC23.4), there are also 58 women identified as widows (either with named husband of the title 'Veuve' or V^{VE}). There are also 15 women who are listed as both a wife and widow (often as M^{ME} V^{VE}), plus a small number of daughters, sisters, mothers and women listed with multiple family relationships. This practice is heavily gendered with only 14 men specifically inscribed in relationship to their relatives, including five husbands, six sons (of which 2 are children and 2 are of unknown age) and one 'child'. See table 16 below.

Female		Male
Wife	75	husband	5
Widow	58	son	6
wife, widow	15	brother	1
Daughter	3	father	1
Sister	3	child	1
Mother	1
mother, widow	1
daughter, widow	1
wife, daughter	1
Total	159	Total	14

Therefore, although it is relatively uncommon to inscribe a family relationship at Père Lachaise (just over 17% of the same had legible inscriptions referring to these relationships, there were a further 8% where the inscription condition was too poor to assess), it was a practice used almost exclusively to record the marital status on women. In fact, there were 10 women in the sample for whom no first name was recorded at all, their names were stated only as Madame and Surname. It may have felt unnecessary to detail every relationship between family members as this would be understood by the family and irrelevant to others. Individual epitaphs and descriptors were less important than the family association (Mytum 2004a, 125-126).

Although Mytum states that in epitaphs for women the overwhelming emphasis is in relation to offspring (2004a, 128), we don't see motherhood dominating representations of women in this sample at Père Lachaise, where they are much more likely to be remembered by their marital status.

Of the 'notable' individuals, 3 include an inscription of family relationships. One is Heloise (the only woman in this sample) who is referred to as 'wife of Abelard'. The other two are among the handful of examples where men are referred to in relationship to others. Alfred de Musset as a son, in the context of the inscription to his parents which reads 'ici repose près de leur fils', and Fréderic Chopin whose inscription mentions his relationship to his French emigrant father and Polish mother. 'fils d'un émigré Francais, marié à Melle Krzyźanowska, fille d'un gentilhomme Polonais'. In these cases, it seems that family pride in the famous son is subverting the usual conventions. Charlotte Amélie Hermine Lardin de Musset, who is buried just behind Alfred de Musset is inscribed as 'Soeur de Alfred de Musset', presumably for the same reason.

Epitaphs and additional information

Many inscriptions are short giving only the name and dates. In the Père Lachaise sample, the numbers of inscriptions which include additional information about the deceased are summarised in Table 17.

Table 17 Summary of information given about the deceased in inscriptions at Père Lachaise

	Profession or titles	Address or residence	Other biograph info	Longer epitaph
Total (1004)	157	16	313	222
'Notable' people (26)	18	5	16	18
Surrounding sample (715)	133	10	233	43
Random sample (263)	6	1	65	161

A significant number of people had their titles, profession or former profession listed on their gravestones and longer epitaphs often included details such as military campaigns, dates of employment in government posts or titles of works created (see table 12). This largely holds with the trends expected from Mytum who states that medical and judicial roles are most likely to be commemorated, followed by political and religious vocations and then military titles (2004a, 148). The absence of religious titles in an ostensibly secular cemetery is no great surprise, but perhaps a wider sample would have been needed to find medical professionals, who may be grouped in a particular area of the cemetery.

For the 'notable' graves these kinds of details were provided for nearly 70% of the sample, showing the importance of reminding viewers of the memorial about their achievements in life. Only a very small number of graves recorded a place of residence (usually given as just Paris), but of those who did 5 were in the sample 'notable' people, emphasising their importance to the city in life. However, one of the most common pieces of information included if other biographical details were listed were places of birth and/or death, showing that geographical connections were very important. The other most commonly included piece of other biographical information was the maiden name for married women, adding another dimension to the gendered expression of familial ties noted above.

The longer epitaphs can be split into the categories shown in table 18. Some epitaphs fit into multiple categories and therefore are counted multiple times. This table excludes the 147 people listed on PLC40 as 'victimes de la catastophie aérienne de CHARM EL CHEIKH 3 janvier 2004' who share this single collective epitaph.

Table 18 summary of epitaph categories in Père Lachaise sample

Of the memorials which note who paid for their erection, three are from the 'notable' sample – 2 paid for my national or popular subscriptions (Noir and Blanqui) plus Wilde's anonymous donor. The others were paid for by in one case friends, and the final two were by a nephew and nieces and a nephew, perhaps because the men in question had no children or none surviving.

There were a handful of patriotic inscriptions without further details given, including two men who 'Mort pour La France' and one 'engagé volontaire' all dating to the Great War. The other inscription of 'patriam dilexit veritatem colvit' ('he loved his country and cultivated the truth' trans. J Wall 2022) appears above the door of the Thiers mausoleum and is the only clue (other than the initial T) as to the identity or importance of the man buried inside.

As well as those inscriptions which detailed the professional qualities and achievements of the deceased, there were 55 inscriptions of a sentimental nature, common phrasing included 'regrets eternels' from family and friends, praise for good qualities as spouses, parents and companions, plus children are referred to as 'dear' or 'angel'. Five of the notable graves have a sentimental aspect to their inscription. For Chopin and Bizet these are brief references to 'Ses Amis' and 'Sa famille et ses amis' repectively, Heloise and Abelard are 'Reuni dans ce tombeau' (reunited in the tomb) and Alfred de Musset outdoes them all with the inclusion of his poem 'Rappelle-toi' and the invocation to his friends to plant a willow tree by his grave. Overall though it is the public than the personal for which the 'notables' are to be remembered. Sentimental illusions might be appropriate for the Romantic and ill-fated lovers, or even for artistic souls, but not for politicians or soldiers.

Religious sentiments are expressed in 81 of the legible epitaphs, although some others were excluded due to poor condition which may have been religious in nature (the lower part of monuments and the smaller lettering used for epitaphs are both more susceptible to weathering) and for some mausoleums there may have been additional inscriptions inside which could not be accessed, which could be expected to be religious in nature, in a space designed for prayer and usually containing an altar. The phrase 'Priez pour lui' and variations thereof as noted by Kselman in cemetery of St Jean in Orleans (2003, 213) was seen at Père Lachaise too, but it was only used as an epitaph for 17 people in the sample – perhaps denoting that the popularity seen up to 1824 in Orleans was not shared in Paris or did not continue throughout the 19th century. Some other inscriptions used Latin phrases 'De profundis' (20 people), 'credo spero amo' (12 people), 'pie Jesu domine dona eis requiem' (11 people) and 'spes unica' (5 people). Surviving examples of longer bible verses were rare (5 examples). There were two Jews buried with the traditional Hebrew inscription 'ת נ צ ב ה'. Oscar Wilde was the only 'notable' buried with a religious inscription (Job 29:22). Even Heloise and Abelard, who spent much of their lives in monastic seclusion, don't ask for our prayers.

6.4 Factors affecting the style and form of monuments to 'notable' individuals

This chapter shows that the monumentality used for the significant and illustrious death contrasts with that used for other burials within the cemetery in a number of ways. Their inscriptions are less likely to be religious or sentimental, and far more likely to detail their professional achievements. The iconography of their monuments is different too – with more illusions to profession and a much greater proportion of depictions of the deceased. There is also greater use of Classical symbolism and less use of Gothic and overly Christian motifs. Their monuments are larger, taller and more complex, using more materials especially bronze and expensive imported stone like marble and granite. Nearly all their graves are marked by pedestal tombs or mausoleums for maximum visual impact and their continued value to French society and role as visitor attractions means their graves are in better condition than others in the cemetery. Clearly, these elite burials are different, even from those which surround them, and this is likely to be for several reasons.

As Ben-Amos (2000, 284) noted, although society in France at this time did not always approve of lavish displays of wealth in life, this was not true in death. The division of funerals into classes based on income and social status, with a matching scale of costs shows that it was not necessarily easy to subvert this convention without social stigma. This would have applied equally to the grave plot and memorial as to the less durable parts of the funerary provision.

It was however not just wealth which was being displayed, the monuments were also part of the cult of the dead, ensuring that these figures would enter posterity and join the community of 'Great Men' in the national memory. Ben-Amos states that there were no 'Great Women' only men (Ben- 2000, 266), and perhaps he is right because poor Heloise is remembered more for her relationship with Abelard than for her own impressive achievements. The monument to Heloise and Abelard, like those for La Fontaine and Molière can be seen solely as deliberate mnemonics, as they were long dead, with no-one left to represent their personal wishes.

For the other 'notables' though we must consider that however much their personal lives might be subsumed beneath their public image, they did still have loved ones involved with the process of their funerals and memorialisation. For example, the wife of Thiers who attempted to insist on paying for his funeral in order to retain control of the guest list (Ben-Amos 2000, 179), and later raised the subscriptions for his mausoleum. We know from Aries and Kselman that the cult of the dead was not just about creating public 'ancestors' for the French people as a whole, it was also about families turning their lost loved ones into real ancestors with whom they could be reunited – both in life by visiting the cemetery, and in death.

Although family relationships are downplayed in inscriptions to the 'notables' in many cases, it is still the case that when Heloise, Abelard, La Fontaine and Molière are excluded, 10 out of the 22 are known to be buried with family members whilst 9 are buried alone (3 are buried in mausoleums with no individual inscriptions visible). In some cases, their monuments have remained personal sites of mourning for generations – this is especially true for Massena whose memorial includes the names of 29 family members, the most recent date of death being 2015. Therefore, our analysis must always seen these monuments as places of private grief as well as public celebration.

6.5 Wider effects of monuments to 'notable' individuals on monumentality

We have seen that in general the styles of memorials for the 'notables' are more likely to be innovative in comparison to the memorials which surround them, making use of novel materials like imported stone earlier and showing adaptation to changing fashions e.g. Art Nouveau even though memorials are generally somewhat conservative and slow moving in style in comparison to other fashions (Mytum 2000). Therefore, it is likely that these monuments could act as trend setters and encourage others to adopt newer styles and materials. The limited scope of this study, which included only 244 graves means that many of the wider effects of the 'notable' burials are difficult to quantify.

There are also some instances of direct imitation of motif between the 'notables' and the graves which surround them, for example the Daubigny grave which features a bronze bust and paint pallet (PLC19.6) very similar to that chosen for Corot 4 years earlier (see figure 111). Jean Baptist Camille Corot and Charles Francois Daubigny were friends and both painters of the Barbizon school.

Another example is the portraits of Massena and Lefebvre who are both depicted in marble in a classical style and even show similarities of composition such as both are facing to the left and are surrounded by swags of foliage and ribbons (see figure 112). We know that the Marshall Lefebvre selected the location of his grave to be adjacent to Massena (as discussed in chapter 4) but there was a clear intention to link them together in the public mind through these monuments too.

There is also imitation between the tombs for the notable dead. The graves of both Blanqui and Noir, were paid for by public subscription and feature bronze statues by the artist Jules Dalou, showing the men as they lay dead (See figure 113). Although Noir died in 1870, the sculpture for Blanqui (d. 1881) was first, as Noir was not moved to Père Lachaise until 1890.

6.6 Summary

This chapter has looked in detail about all aspects of monumentality within the Père Lachaise sample graves including size, form, material, style, iconography and inscriptions, including information about wider trends in France which may have impacted these choices. The differences between the monumentality for the 'notable' dead in comparison to other graves in the cemetery are highlighted, including some of the potential factors influencing these choices. The next chapter will be a similar exploration of the monumentality of the sample graves at Highgate cemetery including comparison to wider British practice. The comparison of the data from both cemeteries can be found in Appendix 4.

Chapter Seven – Monumentality Analysis at Highgate Cemetery

7.1 Introduction

Chapter six was an exploration of the monumentality at Père Lachaise and the wider context for this in Paris and France. Chapter 7 similarly tackles the monumentality of the sample graves in Highgate Cemetery and how this can be analysed in relation to wider trends in the cemetery, London and the British Isles. Once again, the 'notable graves' with be compared to others in the cemetery, using surrounding memorials and a background sample to give an indication of whether these memorials are may representative of the whole, or exceptional in some way as might be expected.

The sample at Highgate is larger than at Père Lachaise with 71 'notable' graves – 57 in the West Cemetery and 14 in the East Cemetery, but still a tiny fraction of the overall number of graves within the cemetery. The background sample is 25 graves, the same as at Père Lachaise, and although this background sample can give us an idea of the wider picture, it is intended to be illustrative of the authors' general observations and not a statistically significant sample.

7.2 Typical monumentality and chronological development up to 1914

As we saw in Chapter 6, there are also several main factors which broadly affected the types of memorials raised to the dead in British Cemeteries during this time. As was noted in France, changing attitudes to death and shifting religious beliefs were also very influential in Britain. This was in fact, partly due to the changes to burial practice which had taken place in French cities with the creation of garden cemeteries being replicated across Europe including the British Isles. The religious and political context within which this occurred was however separate from the French one and will be discussed below.

Many of the stylistic changes which are discussed in Chapter 6, are also seen in a British context, but within some differences, including the influence of the Arts and Crafts movement which was a reaction to the movement away from artisanal crafts towards mass production, which was happening in the Victorian era, and will be discussed in section 7.2.2 below.

The materials and techniques used to create the memorials will also be discussed, including the impact which local geology and trade had on the choice of stone for monuments.

Finally, in addition to the factors discussed in Chapter 6, an additional factor is considered at Highgate. In Paris, where undertaking and associated trades were strictly controlled, the context is quite different to London where there was little to no regulation. This study will therefore examine the makers marks found on the sample memorials and what is known about those monumental masons.

7.2.1 attitudes to death and religion in the 19th and early 20th centuries

The main change it attitudes towards death discussed in chapter 6, applies equally to Britain as to France in the 19th century. The movement of the dead from burial in the centre of towns and cities, to more rural areas on the periphery occurred in both countries. This was partly done to avoid the horrors associated with unhygienic and undignified conditions in overcrowded churchyards. It also allowed the creation of landscaped cemeteries where the beauty of nature and artistic monuments would comfort the bereaved and by morally inspiring for visitors. There was an increasing focus on the importance of family ties and the promise of heavenly reunion with loved ones. Like in France, in Britain, this began at the deathbed, where the emotional role and spiritual support of family was important, while generally the clergyman's role had decreased (Jalland 1996, 18) and during the 19th century, the number of people at the deathbed tended to decrease, focusing more tightly on the immediate family along with a nurse, servant or doctor (Jalland 1996, 27). For the early and mid-Victorians a 'good death' was one where the dying person had time to prepare for their demise (Jalland 1996, 28) and be ready to meet their fate, although from the 1870s onwards a shift occurred and there was an increased focus on a peaceful and painless end as a good death (Jalland 1996, 52) and by 1900 a sudden death or lack of awareness of one's fate were seen as a blessing (Jalland 1996, 54), perhaps as declining mortality rates made death less a part of everyday life. More focus on the deceased as an individual, rather than part of the wider social collective, embodied by their remains even after death, also made the sanctity of a grave which would not be disrupted after burial of greater importance (Tarlow 2000a, 227). There is little evidence to suggest that the living regularly visited the graves of the deceased before the late 18th century (Tarlow 1999a, 125), and the growing use of gravestones from this time suggests that the developing custom of grave visiting was leading to a desire to provide a long-lasting indication of burial location to allow this to occur (Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow 2012, 102). The centrality of the body to grief and the customs of grave marking and visiting, plus the associated discomfort with post-burial disturbance, which made it more difficult to reuse graves would have exaggerated the already problematic overcrowding in urban churchyards, which made them increasingly unpleasant to visit (Curl 1984, 223). Therefore, cemeteries required more attractive conditions along with an assurance of permanence with options for burial 'in perpetuity' (Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow 2012, 102).

There were some key differences between British and French approaches to the burial problem and the political religious backdrop upon which they occurred. Père Lachaise, like other French cemeteries was state owned and secular from its inception. In Britain, the first cemeteries were privately owned and even the later municipal cemeteries were more explicitly religious in character, frequently with multiple chapels for different denominations and areas of consecrated and unconsecrated ground to cater to the needs of the local community. In fact, in Britain, burial reform was motivated by the desire to secure burial space independent of the Church of England from the 1820s onwards, before public health concerns were foregrounded in the 1830s and 40s (Rugg 2020, 79), galvanised by Walker's 'Gatherings from Graveyards' (1839) and Edwin Chadwick's 1843 report on the 'Practice of interment in towns.'

England in the 19th century was an era where there was growth of and increasing tolerance for other Christian denominations especially nonconformist Protestants such as Methodists, Baptists and Quakers (English Heritage, no date), all of whom wanted to express their own beliefs through funerals and burial practices. There was push back from the Church of England who were reliant on revenue from burial fees to support local parish clergy, and thus provision in the Burial Acts for consecration of part of all cemeteries to be consecrated, allowed this income to continue (Rugg 2013, 17) as consecrated areas were 'under the control of the Church of England, creating what is essentially an extension of the existing parish churchyard' (Rugg 2013, 3). Therefore, in Britain, rather than being solely under secular governmental control, burial even in municipal cemeteries remained 'intimately connected with religious politics and the authority and…economics of the Established Church' (Rugg 2020, 80).

This period also saw a church building boom, with the creation of many new parishes to cater for Church of England congregations, particularly in rapidly growing industrialising cities. There was also a wider range of liturgical practices accepted within the Church of England, including High Anglican churches which 'revived rituals, images, incense and vestments not seen in England since the Reformation.' (English Heritage, no date). Overall, while France became increasingly secular, Britain remained an explicitly Christian country, and even the Free Churches campaigning for disestablishment were looking to end the links between the Church of England and the state not to de-Christianise national life, but merely to end the privilege of Anglicans over other denominations (Wolfe 2000, 7).

In the early Victorian period, the 'customary' trappings of a middle-class funeral included black ostrich feather plumes for the horses and pages with tipstaffs walking beside the hearse. Within a generation many of these trappings were deemed to be unnecessary by many families of the same class (Jalland 1996, 1965-6) having heeded the cause of funeral reform. However, state funerals and others for public figures might still be accompanied by much pageantry, but overall the average funeral costs, even for wealthy families had decreased and by the 1870s 'simple funerals had become de rigeur' (Jalland 1996, 202) especially for the intelligentsia, but Julian Litten considers the 1890s to be the 'golden age of the Victorian funeral' (1991, 170) because the trade simply adjusted their scales of what was 'customary' (Litten 1991, 30) to include profitable trappings for the more affluent among the working classes, whose attitudes were slower to change.

Although genuine emotions were felt, the portrayal of these emotions also fed into displays of wealth and status at the funeral. Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow note that aspiration could be as significant as actual wealth with the funeral seen as 'an opportunity to generate social capital and esteem by publicly demonstrating not only wealth but also appropriate emotions, tastes, political and religious sympathies and cultural attitudes, all of which could enhance the social position of a family' (2012, 19). This was displayed through many things including the quality of the coffin and clothing of the deceased, but crucially also through the 'ability to access an exclusive or expensive place of burial' and erection of a lasting monument.

Neoclassical architecture was popular in Britain for similar reasons to those discussed in chapter 6 for France, in particular the associations with Greek democracy and Roman empire, as the British also saw themselves as the successors of these Classical civilisations. Mytum notes that the Classical revival in monumental design was well developed before Highgate opened, taking off in the mid-18th century but continuing to be popular throughout the 19th century, especially with non-conformists (2000, 5). Non-conformist Christians such as Unitarians were less likely to choose Gothic revival styles due to their religious connotations, and so continued to favour Classical monuments. Highgate, like Père Lachaise, has many monuments copied directly from or inspired by ancient ones including the Beer Mausoleum, reported to be inspired by the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus (Historic England 1999i) as seen in Figure 114.

The Egyptian revival began later, in the 19th century (Mytum 2000, 5) but Curl indicates that popularity of Egyptian revival architecture for cemetery buildings like chapels and gates was relatively short lived in England, starting to fall out of fashion by the late 1830s, although it remained popular in America for at least another decade (2002, 271). However, obelisks remained a popular memorial form throughout the 19th century (Yorke 2010, 24) alongside Classical inspired monuments.

The move away from the Egyptian style buildings was at least in part due to Pugin's mockery of the this as 'pagan' and therefore unsuitable for Christian burial and the renewed interest in Gothic architecture of which he was a champion. A. W. N. Pugin was an architect, artist, designer, critic, and convert to Roman Catholicism. His work was inspired by medieval architecture and drawing, and he believed that the buildings of that era were not only more beautiful, but also a reflection of a better quality and character of society, contending ‘that decline in the arts was a result of a spiritual decline occasioned by the Reformation’ (Anderson 2022).

Pugin disapproved of both Neoclassical and Egyptian Revival designs due to their non-Christian roots. In 1836 he published a book called ‘Contrasts’ which was a satirical comparison of medieval buildings and their 19th century counterparts, showing ‘the present decay of taste’. One of the examples used for the unfavourable comparisons was Stephen Geary’s ill-fated Kings Cross, as seen in Figure 115 below.

In 1843, a further publication, ‘An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture’ specifically lampooned the Egyptian style entrance gates to Abney Park Cemetery with a wildly exaggerated caricature (see Figure 116). Thanks in no small part to Pugin, Gothic revival architecture in cemeteries remained ‘in vogue’ throughout the Victorian and Edwardian period (Mytum 2000, 12).

Another interesting association of Gothic Architecture in England was with constitutional liberty and the sovereignty of parliament, once again as a reaction to a Roman past, this time because of the arrival of Germanic ‘Gothic’ tribes in Britain after the end of the Roman Empire, making this style suitable for the Houses of Parliament (Brooks 2001, 221).

The latter part of the 19th century sees the flourishing of the Arts and Crafts movement, having been partly inspired by Pugin's earlier work and the Gothic revival, with a similar desire to return to influences from the Medieval past, in this case simpler and better production methods in small scale workshops. The movement was essentially anti-industrial – motivated by concerns about the loss of traditional skills, the impoverishment of decorative arts and of the social ills caused by mass production. The writings of social reformer John Ruskin and the work of William Morris characterised this style which focuses on craftsmanship, inspiration from nature and simplicity of form. The desire was for products with more integrity, made in a less dehumanising way. The movement was more a 'set of ideals than a prescriptive style' but many of the leading figures were architects who believed in designing a 'harmonious whole' including architecture, furniture, decoration and objects. In the late 19th and early 20th century the Arts and Crafts movement was flourishing in cities across Britain including London, Birmingham, Manchester and Glasgow, but as the movement was based on a nostalgia for rural traditions many artists also established workshops in rural areas, provided there were good rail links. The impetus of the movement in Britain was lost after WWI (Victoria and Albert Museum, no date). Arts and Crafts influences are seen on monuments which fit into broader stylistic trends – primarily Gothic and Celtic revival monuments, but also sometimes 'rustic' styled monuments, designed to mimic natural forms and also the British take on Art Nouveau memorials.

One early monument which shows how these influences could be expressed on gravestones is the grave of Grave of Elizabeth Madox Brown (HGW5.6) c. 1846. Her husband Ford Madox Brown was an early Pre-Raphaelite painter, a style which was characterised by 'minute description of detail, a luminous palette of bright colors…and subject matter of a noble, religious, or moralizing nature' (Meagher 2004). Their work, like the Arts and Crafts movement, was inspired by the work of John Ruskin, and Dante Gabriele Rossetti and Edward Burne-Jones joined William Morris's design company in 1861 (Meagher 2004).

Mytum has stated that Celtic Crosses and other similar designs did not carry 'the same intensity of meaning' (2000, 20) outside of Ireland, and certainly some examples of Celtic or 'ringed' crosses such as the one shown above in Figure 117 do not appear to have any ties to Ireland. However, London had a sizable Irish population in the 19th century so we cannot rule out the use of Celtic Crosses as an expression of Irish identity by the diaspora as a reason why this style might be chosen for monuments in Highgate cemetery.

Even in Ireland, Celtic revival styles could be used to have different meanings depending on the political agenda of the people involved, but in general the public viewed 'Celtic' as a vague term associated with an idealised past before the Norman English conquest and subsequent English Protestantism (O'Shea 2000, 222). Ancient Irish art, history and culture were used as badges of positive Irish identity – including Shamrocks, Irish Harps, Irish Wolfhounds and Depictions of Ancient Round Towers (O'Shea 2000, 226) all of which harked back to a Medieval golden age when Ireland was the 'Island of Saints and Scholars' (O'Shea 2000, 229). By the end of the 19th century, these symbols were everywhere in Ireland, from decorative objects to gravestone motifs (O'Shea 2000, 229), with Round Towers also being used as a form of funerary monument (e.g. O'Connell Tower in Glasnevin Cemetery Dublin). However, it was Celtic Crosses which became the most successful marker of Irish identity to be used as grave markers. They 'succeeded in capturing the imagination of those who considered themselves Irish, both at home and abroad- indeed the export of Celtic Crosses to Australia and America became big business' (O'Shea 2000, 231). Therefore, we should consider that expression of Irish nationalist sentiments are one of the possible motivations for the use of Celtic Crosses for gravestones. However, like the Gothic revival championed by Pugin, this was also a religious revival, harking back to a Christian, and often specifically Catholic, past and so Celtic Crosses were also popular because they were more suited to a place of Christian burial than broken columns or urns with their pagan inspirations (O'Shea 2000, 234).

Other notable developments are Art Nouveau and Art Deco, followed by Modernism in the 20th century, as discussed in section 6.2.2, although Art Nouveau monuments are generally rarer in Britain than in France due to the relatively short-lived nature of this style.

7.2.3 Material choices for monumental masonry during the 19th and early 20th centuries

At Père Lachaise it is possible to get an immediate overall impression of the most common type of stone used. This isn't possible at Highgate, particularly in the West cemetery due to the density of vegetation. But as one spends time wandering the paths, the cumulative effect is similar to that at Père Lachaise, that most monuments are made from light-coloured limestone or weathered marble.

However, whilst at Père Lachaise the limestone was locally sourced, at Highgate there is no local stone and everything has to be imported. London is a city built on sand, gravel and clay, poorly consolidated and unsuitable for building (British Geological Survey, no date) and therefore from the earliest days stone has been imported into the city to construct its buildings and commemorate its dead.

After the Great Fire of London, Portland Stone became the stone of choice for 'buildings of consequence'. Its popularity continuing in the 18th century alongside Grey Cornish Granite (Kirk and Cook, no date). Both transported using water, around the coast and up the Thames into London. In the 19th century, the coming of the railway opened up new quarries and vastly increased the range of types of stone available for building in the capital. Including 'grey and red granites from Cornwall and Scotland; white, grey, yellow and green sandstones from the numerous Pennine quarries, and yellow and cream coloured limestones from the Jurassic of Gloucestershire, Wiltshire and Oxfordshire.' (British Geological Surrey, no date) and it seems certain that many of these limestones feature alongside Portland Stone at Highgate, there are also sandstone examples, from Pennine or other quarries in the North and West of England (English Heritage 2011, 10). Increasingly common over time are stones imported from further afield like the Scottish Granite and Italian marble discussed in Chapter 6, which enjoyed just as much popularity in Britain as they did in France.

Although the Geology of London was unsuitable for use a building stone, it was possible to make bricks from the clays, and huge numbers were used to rebuild London after the Great Fire and remained the most common building material until the 1840s (Cox 1997, 57). In the cemetery at Highgate, we see many of these bricks, although not all would have originally intended to be visible. The vaults and bases of the monuments are built from yellow London bricks, usually designed to be below ground level or clad by stone slabs. Likewise, behind their stuccoed façade so are the Egyptian Avenue and Circle of Lebanon (see figure 118). In addition to this, the chapels were constructed using a mixture of bricks and stone facings, matching the boundary wall around the cemetery.

Figure 118 exterior of the Egyptian Avenue showing areas where damage to the stucco reveals the bricks used for construction

Although the stone types chosen for the monuments at would be partially decided based on what kinds of stone are useful, for example which are easy to carve or make durable structures, there are also other factors considered. Industrialisation didn't just make it easier to transport stone, it also provided new technology for cutting and shaping stone. For the first time many stones were sold as mass produced 'blanks' to local stone masons, who then might add additional designs as well as the inscriptions, to suit their customers tastes.

7.2.4 Monumental mason marks at Highgate Cemetery and the wider influence of tradesmen on monumentality

Very few pre-1914 monuments in Père Lachaise gave any indication of who they were created by, with the exception of some artist signatures on busts and statues, and some plaques commemorating restorations. This is likely because the tightly controlled funeral trade in Paris did not incentivise the masons to advertise on their work. In contrast, At Highgate Cemetery, masons marks were found on 13% of the memorials and this is likely to underestimate the real total because many memorials are not in their original condition or have suffered from shifting; either leaning or sinking due to poor foundations, tree roots etc. or the base, where marks are often located, has become buried due to the increase in soil level produced by 50+ years of leaf mould which built up when the cemetery was neglected. Therefore, we can safely assume that the original number would have been higher.

The makers marks which were legible belong to 27 or 28 companies (one partial name found) across 75 memorials. The most common among them are Millward and Co which appeared on 25 stones. Their makers mark includes the phrase 'MASONS TO THE COMP^{Y}' They advertised as 'The Cemetery Memorial Company' with an address of 'Memorial Works, Cemetery gates, Highgate N.' (North Londoner 1870). The second most common mark was Daniels Highgate, found on 21 stones, referring to Henry Daniel & Co of Church House Swains Lane. Most of the other makers marks seen are from a relatively restricted geographical area within North London and a few from London more widely, with 1 or at most 2 examples of their work. There are 2 makers marks for non-London masons – A. Macdonald Aberdeen (both on granite memorials) and Lizard Serpentine Co. Pottesco Cornwall. There are no makers marks visible from non-UK masons- for example none of the marble statues have an Italian mark visible.

Newspaper adverts indicate that it is likely that at least 2 other masons with premises in Highgate would have supplied memorials to the cemetery– including T. Dunkley (Hampstead & Highgate Express 1881) and G. P. Mills (Hampstead & Highgate Express 1881) but none of their marks were found in the sample. We know from the text in a Henry Daniel & Co advertising brochure that the Cemetery Company 'make no restrictions on whom you should employ. Intimations of official authority as sole appointed Masons to take orders may be disregarded, as the Cemetery Company do not interfere with customers wishes in this matter'. Which indicates that there was a healthy rivalry between the 'official' masons Millward and Daniel but that customers were free to choose any mason for their work.

Projects investigating memorial masons design books and surviving outputs could be instructive in seeing how the competitive market within the field of monumental design affected the monuments available for customers to purchase, but that is beyond the scope of this thesis. However, it is to be noted that generally little documentation survives and that due to the cultural expectations for greater standardisation many monuments which were locally made are still indistinguishable from those produced over vast areas of the globe at the same time (Mytum 2004a, 63).

7.3 Monumentality and chronological development of sample graves

The analysis carried out below uses identical criteria to those used for the Père Lachaise monuments in Chapter 6, which will allow a direct comparison in Appendix 4. The first factor which is considered in condition, because the preservation of the memorials affects the ability to assess the rest of the criteria. Monuments which are in poor condition are excluded from some of the other analyses because of uncertainty about their original appearance. Then the overall style and form of the monument are considered before turning attention to the decorative motifs and inscription.

7.3.1 Condition

In this thesis, in accordance with the suggestion of Mytum (2000, 94) condition of the monument and the inscription are recorded separately. This is because it is relatively common to find examples both of monuments which are in an overall sound condition but where the inscription has become illegible from weathering, and of the reverse where a monument is leaning or collapsed but the inscription is in relatively good condition. One addition has been made to Mytum's scheme, and that is to include categories which record the effect of vegetation on ability to assess condition.

This reflects that in both cemeteries the monument recording had to take place without any cleaning or clearance of vegetation, due to restrictions on these activities. At Père Lachaise, because only period of fieldwork was possible, the fieldwork was carried out in January in order to minimise the amount of growth present. At Highgate, most of the issues are caused by ivy which is evergreen and therefore winter visits made less difference to ease of study. This was combatted by making multiple visits to affected grave locations during the course of this study, which in several cases meant that the cemetery gardening team had used their specialist knowledge to safely tackle the ivy without damaging the stones. However, in both cemeteries there were still a number of graves which couldn't be accurately assessed other than to acknowledge the danger which the vegetation itself posed for the memorial. The notable graves were in an overall good condition, as shown in the graph below, figure 119.

As figure 119 shows, nearly 81% of the 'notable graves' are in a sound condition. Of the remaining graves, only two had suffered total collapse, with another four at risk of this due to leaning or partial collapse. There were also a small number suffering a lesser degree of damage; in two cases monuments or some of their elements were in a sound condition but had shifted from their original position (for example the monument and kerb were no longer aligned parallel to one another) and in three cases these graves were partially overgrown placing them at higher future risk of deterioration – particularly displacement by tree roots. The picture is somewhat more complex with the surrounding graves, with a wider variety of conditions and more intrusive vegetation (figure 120).

Overall, the condition of these memorials is still relatively good, with 54% of the surrounding memorials being sound and in their original location, and a further 3% being sound but displaced. However, the remaining graves show quite varied preservation. In this sample, 9% (39 graves) had suffered total collapse, and a further 19% (79 graves) were leaning or partially collapsed. The effect of vegetation was much more noticeable in this sample too – with 44 partially overgrown graves, and 13 where their condition couldn't be assessed with any certainty. With the random sample (figure 121) we see a stark contrast, with only 32% sound and in their original location. Although this sample doesn't show any graves which were partially overgrown, this is because many of the graves near trees or bushes had already started leaning or suffered from some degree of collapsing (24% condition 4 or 5) but the biggest difference was that due to the sampling method we were able to really see how many graves have totally lost their memorial (32% with none surviving).

This is revealing because as discussed in Chapter 5, there are probably memorials missing from the surrounding graves sample too – those which through fieldwork alone could be assumed to be unused plots, informal pathways etc.

Monument condition is partly affected by material because limestone and sandstone are more susceptible to weathering than harder igneous rocks. Marble is particularly susceptible to acid rain but is otherwise also more resistant to erosion than other carbonate rock memorials (Kirk and Cook, no date). Material will be discussed further in Section 7.2.4 below. In an unmanaged cemetery where all the memorials were of the same stone type you would expect the oldest graves to be most at risk of collapse/loss, but at Highgate cemetery three main cemetery management practices have affected condition of the memorials more than the age, summarised below in table20.

These factors show why much of the random sample and generally those monuments which are not on main pathways have either been lost or suffered from worse damage without restoration occurring.

Factor	Explanation
Landscaping	Although the cemetery landscape was carefully managed during the 19th century, the 20th century saw a large reduction in staffing and after the bankruptcy of the London Cemetery Company in 1960, the landscape was largely neglected until the Friends group was founded in 1975. The Friends group have since been balancing the needs of a working cemetery with those of a nature reserve. Ivy has often been preserved as a wildlife habitat and was only cleared along pathways with a particular focus on and areas which attract visitors- referred to as 'set-piece tombs' (FoHC 2017, 2019).
Monument restoration	There has been an extensive programme of repairs and restoration to the memorials at Highgate cemetery, but once again attention has been focused along pathways and areas which attract visitors- referred to as 'set-piece tombs'. Restoration only done if considered beneficial to the overall significance of the site (FoHC 2017, 2019).
Continued use of cemetery for burial	In some places paths have been narrowed to add rows, additional plots especially for cremation deposits have been sold where spaces available and some purchased unused plots have been resold (FoHC 2017, 2019).

These factors also explain the almost total loss of HGW2.1 the 9th Duke of St Albans monument (figure 122), the only one of the 'notable' burials to suffer this fate, which was removed from the grave and relocated to the courtyard not only because of safety fears after damage from a falling tree, but also because the grave remained empty when he was interred in a family mausoleum elsewhere. The removal of the monument allowed this large plot in a desirable area of the cemetery to be available for resale (Camden Council 2016). As space is now at a premium in the cemetery, it is likely that plots will continue to be reused where possible.

Overall, the condition of the inscriptions was worse than of the monuments because inscriptions are more susceptible to weathering and harder to restore. The percentage of notable monuments (figure 123) where the entire inscription could substantially be read (condition 1-3) was higher than on those which surrounded them (figure 124), which was in turn much higher than the random sample (figure 125) where 32% had no surviving inscription. Two of those 'notable' graves where the inscription was in mint condition were almost new 21st century gravestones marking their resting places. Of the others, some like the Beer Mausoleum have undergone restoration and the others had inscriptions in or on hardwearing materials such as granite and bronze, materials which (as we will see in Section 7.2.4) are more commonly used for 'notable' graves than the other samples. More effort also appears to have been made to keep the 'notable' graves free from overgrowth than other graves surrounding them (in keeping with the landscaping policies above) as can be seen from lower proportion of condition 6 graves.

In many cases those memorials which were too obscured by ivy to read or photograph, may have surviving inscriptions underneath the cover, but removing the ivy to check would risk damaging them (especially those with lead lettering, or partially weathered surfaces where the aerial roots, especially of young stems, might be more strongly adhered. There is however some indication that ivy protects the stones from weathering and air pollution and so leaving it in place until such time as expert removal can take place (if desirable) is a responsible choice in many cases, although removing long stems from the top can be a good compromise if the stone at risk of becoming top heavy (Caring for God's Acre 2008).

7.3.2 Style

As mentioned above, poor memorial condition and overgrowth by vegetation can prevent the researcher being able to gain more information about the style, form and details of the memorial which means that the data set is slightly smaller when looking at the styles of monuments because it wasn't possible to categorise all of those recorded.

There are also a larger number of styles present in the surrounding graves sample -which may be partly influenced by date because the surrounding graves are not constrained to pre-1914, so for example Art Deco and Modern styles are understandably more common. There are also more 'Rustic' style graves, which became popular in the later part of the 19th century alongside the Arts and Crafts movement, the style being used to indicate a preference for 'natural' forms and traditional craftsmanship. In the random sample, the memorials of known style are mostly Classical and Gothic memorials, alongside Art Deco memorials (once again reflecting the larger date range of this sample).

There were several cases where determining the architectural style of the monument was something of a judgement call, because of the hybrid nature of many Victorian monuments. A prime example of this being a monument whose form was inspired by classical architecture but with 'gothic' script lettering. In these cases, the overall appearance of the monument was used to broadly categorize them, but it is worth noting that the divisions between the architectural movements are not sharp lines at Highgate. Mytum suggests that when 'monuments combine features from a number of stylistic traditions' this is 'a reflection of the tastes of both masons and patrons with regard to the composition of memorial designs' (Mytum 2000, 5).

This is also why no attempt has been made to subdivide the 'Classical' monuments, to separate for example those with a Greek revival influence from those which are Romanesque. For the monumental mason working at Highgate in the 19th and early 20th centuries, the entire Classical repertoire could be combined at will to produce whatever effect was desired and many graves combine elements from Greek and Roman traditions. In both the notable and surrounding graves samples, the most popular style is Classical representing 63% and 49% of the moments respectively. This is unsurprising given the associations of Classical architecture discussed earlier in this chapter.

One noted difference to Père Lachaise and the French Neoclassical revival though is the treatment of Egyptian architectural styles. There is a more marked attempt to create Egyptianising monuments at Highgate, rather than simply seeing these motifs and elements as part of a broader Classical pallet. This is typified by the creation of the Egyptian Avenue and Circle of Lebanon (figure 129).

Although later the styles do become more blurred, as shown by the addition of the Classical style pediments in the Outer Circle in 1870. Overall, the number of Egyptian monuments at Highgate is not a large one, 8% of 'notable' graves and 7% of the surrounding graves (not present in the random sample).

The second most popular style in the Highgate sample was Gothic, with 14% of the 'notable' graves, and 26% of surrounding graves featuring this style (and also 24% of monuments identifiable in the random sample). Celtic revival monuments account for 6% the notable graves, and 3% of surrounding graves. There were only small numbers of Art Nouveau (2 notable, 2 surrounding) and Rustic (1 notable, 9 surrounding) monuments in the sample.

This overall picture though, could hide chronological patterns and figures 130 and 131 were produced to track the popularity of each style over time. When producing this, graves of unknown style and unknown date were both excluded. The memorials on HGE1 and HGE5 were also excluded as they do not represent the original memorial style. This means the sample size for the notable graves is considerably smaller, with 56 graves, and the surrounding grave sample is also much reduced to 355, although a further 51 of these can be discounted from most analysis because they are dated after 1914. The random sample was not included in this analysis due to sample size being too small to reveal any chronological patterns.

Generally, the patterns are similar for both samples, with some small difference which will be noted below, however any discrepancies are far more likely to be due to the small sample size of the 'notable' graves than any statistical significance. The periods with most memorials are 1855-1869 and 1870-1884, which fits with that is known for the cemetery overall. The popularity of Highgate was at its peak at this time, and demand for graves in the West cemetery remained high even after the East cemetery opened in 1854.

In the 'notable' graves, Classical is the most popular style in all time periods, and this pattern largely holds true in the surrounding sample too, with the exception of 1885-1899 when it is overtaken by Gothic for a short period.

The pattern for Gothic monuments in the famous graves is relatively consistent, with low numbers in all time periods with the exception of 1855-1869 where they are absent. This is probably partly because of the small sample size and also the fact that Classical style was the default, particularly for non-conformists, whereas Gothic had specifically religious, and often Anglican connotations. The pattern in the surrounding graves is far more what would have been expected from wider known trends – Gothic revival monuments grow in popularity from when the cemetery opened and reach peak popularity at the same time as the cemetery as a whole, before declining again without ever becoming unpopular. The popularity of Celtic revival style peaks at the same time as Gothic revival. These two styles inspired by British and Irish Christian tradition, rather than the ancient civilisations of Mediterranean world were both considered more suitable for funerary monuments than Classical 'pagan' styles by many people in the 19th century. There was a resurgence in building Gothic churches too, and also a wider Celtic cultural revival in Ireland.

The appearance of Egyptian memorials in the 'notables' sample is later than would have been predicted by Curl, partly because the Egyptian Avenue vault of Dalziel although built when the cemetery was new, wasn't occupied until 1866. In the surrounding graves sample, Egyptian styles are present from the beginning, but the peak of Egyptian memorials occurs in 1870-1884. This popularity is mostly down to a growing use of obelisks as a monumental form. 62% of the Egyptian revival monuments in the sample are Obelisks, this represents all the memorials which are not catacombs in the Circle of Lebanon or the Egyptian Avenue. Clearly, although Egyptian architecture had fallen out of favour for cemetery buildings, obelisks remained a valid choice for memorials.

As noted above the Victorians did not stick to strict style boundaries, and often mixed influences leading to some monuments which are ambiguous in style, and this seems to have been primarily influenced by the masons and their patrons own tastes. The sample doesn't indicate that monuments to significant and notable figures had any influence on the overall style of memorials.

7.3.3 Form

The average size and height are greater for the 'notable' graves than those which surround them, as demonstrated by the visibility indexes in Chapter 5. The average height for the notable graves is 2.21m and for the surrounding graves it is 1.58m, while for the random sample it is 1.90m. The plot size and memorial sizes are larger too as shown in table 21.

Table 21 Average (mean) measurements for sample graves at Highgate by category

Height	164cm	221cm	158cm	109cm
Width	99cm	122cm	97cm	81cm
Width with ad. els.	147cm	196cm	141cm	86cm
Length	98cm	126cm	94cm	68cm
Length with ad. els.	238cm	255cm	235cm	214cm

The notable graves also show a greater range of forms. The typology of monuments used for this thesis and adapted from Mytum (2000), breaks monuments at Highgate into six broad categories as shown in Table 22 below. Each of these categories is subdivided into many different forms, representing the breadth of memorials available in the Victorian period.

Table 22 Memorial forms as categorised by Mytum (2000)

Form	Code	Description
Low monuments	0100-0900	Ledger slabs, low monuments and low monuments on a stepped base, also kerbs as a primary monument
Chest Tombs	1000	Chest and table tombs. Can be topped with crosses and sculptures.
Crosses	2000	Crosses with stepped or rocky bases, not those on tombs or headstones
Headstones etc.	4000-8000	Headstones are upright, narrow in profile and have a vertical flat surface carrying the inscription, but come in a huge variety of shapes and forms. Includes modern memorial types e.g. rocky monolith, desk with bible, scroll
Pedestal tombs	3000, 9000-9500	Taller than a chest tomb, usually taller than they are wide/long. Common types include columns, obelisks, urns and sculptures.
Catacomb	9600	Subterranean buildings with burial niches for individual coffins and/or family vaults.
Mausoleums	9800	Buildings created as monuments and as a place to visit e.g. with altar for prayer

As seen in Table 23 below overall, the most common memorial type in the whole Highgate sample are headstones, which is in line with that would be expected based on Mytum's experience that headstones are 'by far the most common form of memorial' (2000, 109) and chest tombs are relatively rare in cemeteries in comparison to churchyards (Mytum 2004a, 69). There are also substantial numbers of low monuments (including a small number of ledger slabs and kerb only monuments) and also pedestal tombs at Highgate. In fact, in the 'notable' graves sample, pedestal tombs are the most numerous memorial form, ahead of headstones, reflecting a preference for larger and taller monuments with more decorative elements to commemorate these significant figures. Tall pedestals topped with columns, obelisks and especially statues are very eye catching and have a strong visual identity – standing out from the other graves around them. Mausoleums are not common at Highgate, but those which were built are generally large and have a substantial visual impact due to their size and rarity. There are also sample graves from the 3 main catacombs at Highgate – the Egyptian Avenue, Circle of Lebanon and Terrace catacombs are all represented, although the Cuttings Catacombs (in the unconsecrated section of the West Cemetery) does not feature in this sample.

Table 23 Monument forms in the Highgate sample

Form	Total	Notable	Surrounding	Random
Ledger/Low monument	109	10	96	3
Chest/Table tomb	38	9	29	0
Cross	79	7	67	5

Pedestal tomb	124	21	102	1
Catacomb	22	2	20	0
Mausoleum	8	4	4	0
Total	569	71	481	17

A higher proportion of the notable graves sample have additional elements which take up the whole plot such as railings, kerbs, footstones and bodystones. In the notable graves sample 83% have additional elements, compared to 61% of the surrounding graves, as shown in table 24.

Table 24 Additional elements with monuments in Highgate sample

Kerb only	107	18	83	6
Kerb with railings or chains	35	6	29	0
Ledger slab/base	14	3	11	0
Ledger slab/base + kerb etc.	4	1	3	0
Raised base/bodystone	73	8	63	2
Raised base/bodystone + kerbs etc.	17	2	14	1
Tomb height base/bodystone	58	10	47	1
Tomb height base/bodystone + kerbs etc.	34	6	27	1
Plaque or additional headstone within plot	5	3	2	0
Footstone	16	1	13	2
Footstone + other elements	7	1	5	1
Total	370	59	297	13

Although a higher percentage of the notable graves have additional elements, there is not much difference in the types chosen with simple kerbs (with or without posts) being the most common type in all samples. The use of raised bases (with or without other additional elements) is common along the main pathways which explains why these forms are common in the notable and surrounding graves samples but rare in the random sample.

7.3.4 Materials

Section 7.1.3 above details the types of stone which were used commonly in London during the 19th century. This thesis looks in more detail at which types were used for the monuments in the sample at Highgate cemetery. Like at Père Lachaise, in addition to stone, there are also metal components to these memorials; mostly iron and copper alloys (such as brass and bronze) and also a small number of wooden memorials.

The materials are recorded in order of what proportion of the monument is made up from each. Material 1 is the largest proportion and Material 4 is the smallest proportion. This is based on what is visible, and therefore does not include materials are usually hidden in the construction such as foundations and vaults (such as brick). Of the 71 notable graves, only two were a composite of 4 materials (2.8%), but 11 contained 3 materials (15%), and nearly half were comprised of 2 materials (35 of 71, 49%). Overall, the surrounding graves are less complex, with only 30% containing two different materials, 8.2% containing 3 materials and 0.8% containing 4 materials. The random sample contained only 17 graves of known material, so they were not analysed separately any further. Of the total sample of 586, graves 12 were excluded from the material analysis because the materials could not be determined (e.g. due to the degree of overgrowth, destruction of monument) of these, 8 were in the random sample. See table 25 for details.

1 or more	574	71	486	17
2 or more	183	35	145	2
3 or more	51	11	40	0
4 materials	6	2	4	0

In the notable graves sample most common main material was white marble, followed by limestone. There are also a significant proportion of 'granite' memorials, and one made from Serpentine which is a metamorphic stone often with a distinctive green colour, quarried in Cornwall. Slate, probably from Wales, was chosen for one gravestone but this was a modern memorial erected in 2008. See figure 132.

When looking at the whole sample (figure 133) white marble and limestone were the most common main materials, but limestone makes up a larger percentage, and white marble a somewhat smaller one than for notable graves alone. More exotic stone types like coloured granites are slightly less well presented than when looking solely at the notable graves. Overall, there is a broader range of materials chosen, including sandstone and wood which aren't seen in the notable graves, and would have been more affordable than granites and marbles.

The secondary materials (Materials 2, 3 and 4) on the 'notable' graves tend to be either decorative imported stone, especially coloured stone types, or metal elements, usually iron railings or doors but there are a small number of copper alloy elements. There is also a high prevalence of limestone as a secondary material, often used for the base of a marble monument. See table 26 for details.

Table 26 Additional materials used in the construction of 'notable' graves at Highgate

Material	Material 2	Material 3	Material 4

The additional materials on the surrounding graves show some similarities to the famous graves, such as the high proportion of limestone bases and iron railings and similarly limited use of brass decorations, but the use of granite as a decorative stone was somewhat lower (table 27). The resin used as an additional material was a small modern memorial plaque added to the side of an older family vault.

Table 27 Additional materials used in the construction of all sample graves at Highgate

Overall, the memorials are relatively complex and use a number of expensive materials including marble and granite. The relatively low use of 'cheaper' materials like limestone and sandstone in comparison to other British cemeteries are probably partly because in London all stone has to be imported, making the cost difference smaller, but also reflect the elite nature of Highgate cemetery as a whole. The higher prevalence of complex monuments with multiple materials and the higher percentage of white marble for the 'notable' dead indicate that expensive materials were valued as a way of indicating the importance of these burials and making them visually distinct from others surrounding them, even within this already elite setting.

7.3.5 Motifs

A 'decorative motif' is the term Mytum uses to describe all memorial decorations, which he divides into two broad categories; main decorative motifs and marginal decorative elements such as borders and columns (2000, 124-126).

Firstly, the quantity of main decorative motifs on the different parts of the Highgate sample were analysed. As shown in Figure 134 below, the 'notable burials' were more likely to have 2 or more decorative motifs and less likely to have no decoration or only 1 motif than the rest of the sample. The random sample (n=15) is too small to draw many conclusions but there is a higher than average concentration of memorials with just 1 motif – a third of the sample. These stats exclude graves where the type and quantity of decoration were unknown e.g. due to deterioration, loss or vegetation covering the monument.

However, this graph doesn't include any consideration of the marginal decorative motifs, which contribute to the overall visual complexity of the monument. As shown in Table 28.

Table 28 Number of marginal motifs by sample type at Highgate Cemetery

	No marginal motifs	1 marginal motif	2 marginal motifs	3 marginal motifs	4 marginal motifs
Notable (70 graves)	51	12	7	0	0

The percentage of graves which have marginal decorative elements is low but will still be included when considering total decoration levels. Figure 135 below, includes both main and marginal decorative motifs and looks at the amount of decoration over time in the sample graves.

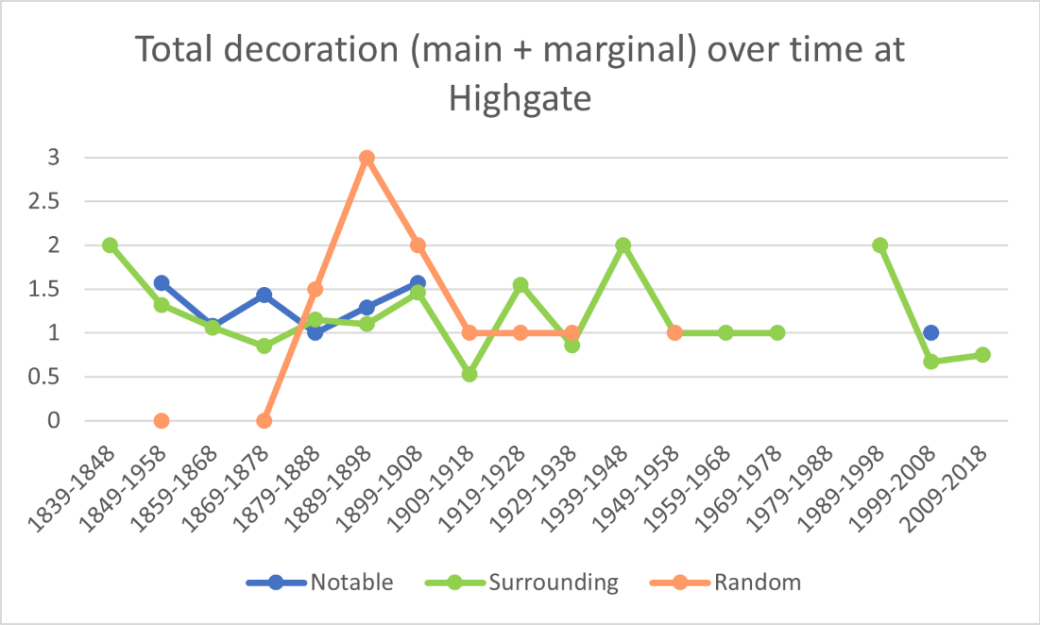

Figure 135 Total decoration (number of main motifs + marginal motifs) on average (mean) for notable graves (n= 59), surrounding graves (n=359) and random sample (n=12) by decade

The random sample is based on a very small data set and so the mean is more susceptible to extreme high and low values where many of the data points are based on a single data point. The surrounding graves sample suffers from similar issues from small sample sizes pre-1848 and post 1918. Between 1849 and 1908 when there is the best data set, all of the notable and surrounding graves have a mean decoration level between 0.86 and 1.57, and in 5 of the 6 time periods the notable graves had a slightly higher decoration level than those surrounding them.

This difference is small and unlikely to be particularly significant. The type of decoration might be instructive to understanding the monuments designed to commemorate the individuals in the sample. Marginal decorative elements are generally linked to the overall style of the memorial, for example Classical memorials might have Doric columns or dentils and Gothic ones might have crockets or arcading. The main decorative motifs are more likely reveal more detailed information about the individuals commemorated and to convey deliberate meaning rather than being purely decorative. It is not believed that choice of motifs was restricted in any way at Highgate by the London Cemetery Company, as was also usual in other London cemeteries, such Kensal Green where customers had total freedom of design choice making the meanings expressed 'particularly clear' (Brooks 2001, 212). Therefore we can assume that those choosing memorial designs at Highgate had full agency over monuments designs.

As seen in section 6.2.5 they can be divided into six main categories: mortality, religion, images of the deceased, lineage and nationality, life and profession, flora and fauna. These types are explained in Table 15 in chapter 6. There are 291 graves in the sample where at least one motif is identifiable, between them these graves have 462 motifs depicted on them. The breakdown of motifs by category is shown in figure 136.

In the total sample the most common symbolism is religious with crosses making up the majority of this category, plus a number of other symbols with Christian links which appear a number of times including cherubs and angels, gothic motifs and doves. All of the religious motifs found in the Highgate sample are Christian. The next largest category is flora and fauna etc. – many flowers and animals had a specific meaning to the Victorians. In this analysis, those with directly religious meaning, such as passionflowers, are included in the religious symbolism. At Highgate there are three animal symbols which are also excluded from this category because they are directly related to the life and profession of the grave owner. The next biggest category are symbols of mortality such as urns and inverted torches, and other symbols mostly drawn from a classical repertoire. In the whole sample, symbols which relate to the lineage or family of the deceased such as flags, initials and family crests, depictions of profession and images of the individual themselves – including portraits and busts are rare at Highgate.

The notable graves sample shows some marked contrasts to the rest of the Highgate sample. Depictions of profession and images of the deceased are much more common than in the rest of the sample, whilst symbols of mortality and religious depictions and flora/fauna are less common.

Mortality motifs

Motifs which are related to beliefs about death and the afterlife fall into two main categories at Highgate cemetery; those which are inspired by Christian beliefs (discussed below) and those which echo Classical symbolism. Their knowledge of the Classical world gave the Victorians a rich language of symbols to draw upon when creating memorials to honour their dead. The most commonly chosen ones at Highgate are wreaths (40 examples) symbolising victory over death, inverted torches (24 examples, including all the catacomb doors in the Egyptian Avenue, Circle of Lebanon and Terrace catacombs) and urns, both with drapery (21 graves) and without (10 graves). There are also a small number of sculptures inspired by classical figures in the sample. Two are depictions of hope with her anchor and another is of a figure weeping over an urn.

Religious motifs

Some Christian symbols are overt, for example crosses, angels and IHS symbols (which is an abbreviation of the Greek spelling of Jesus), and others are more subtle for example clasped hands which are sometimes accompanied by the phrase 'til we meet again' and represent the belief that the family would be reunited in heaven. Heaven is not well defined in Victorian belief, with some seeing it as a place of peace, worship and closeness to God, while others view it as a happy home where their earthly loves will continue (Jalland 1996, 269). Both views of heaven are represented by the symbolism and epitaphs at Highgate. The most commonly used symbol in the entire Highgate sample were plain latin crosses (90 graves). When other crosses (e.g. Celtic, Maltese, Gothic) were also included this gave a total of 131 graves with crosses, just over 28% of graves in the total sample.

The use of IHS symbols (25 examples) show that this symbol had become popular again due to the Gothic revival (Mytum 2000, 36). Angels also experienced a resurgence post-1850 having previously seen as tainted by 'Popery' with allegories such as figures of Hope having been favoured instead from the 18th century (Brooks 2001, 222). Angels were often carved at Italian centres of production like Carrara and shipped as 'blanks' (Mytum 2004a).

There are a small number of memorials which include actual representations of the deceased visible in the sample, 3 portraits carved in relief, one is a bust and there is one photograph. 4 of these are in the 'notable' graves sample but the photograph is on a relatively new grave in the surrounding graves sample – the grave of Alexander Litvinenko (died 2006). This means that all the graves in the sample which include an image of the deceased are those belonging to people who were well known at the time of their death, perhaps indicating that wanting visitors to remember the appearance of the deceased is a desire most likely to occur for graves which will get lots of public visits. The creation of a large bust of Karl Marx for his new memorial corroborates this idea.
The lower percentage of memorials with sculptural elements is unlikely to be an anomaly of Highgate with Kensal Green also noted to have fewer 'great sculptural displays' than continental cemeteries like Père Lachaise (Physick 2001, 243). Many statues which depict the deceased were made by specialists in Italy from photographs (Mytum 2004a, 79), perhaps the expense of transportation discouraged popularity in Britain.

Lineage and Nationality

These are motifs such as family crests, flags and other symbols which relate to the lineage or nationality of the deceased. There is only one flag at Highgate – the Polish flag on the Worcell grave where he is buried with fellow Polish exiles. The flag is also accompanied by an Eagle to further increase the patriotic symbolism. There are no other explicit depictions of Nationality in the Highgate sample.

The most common symbol in this category are shields with coats of arms (8 graves) and there are also 3 graves where the initials of the family name were used as a decorative element. These decorations were slightly less common in the 'notable' graves sample than those surrounding them, suggesting that individual contribution was highlighted over family ties.

Life and profession

Many memorials in the Highgate sample also include some symbolism which is more personal to the deceased individual, such as profession or life achievements which the person who commissioned the monument wanted to portray. These are quite common in the notable graves sample and rarer in the rest of the Highgate sample graves, which corroborates the point above about the importance of highlighting individual contribution in this sample.

By their very nature, these symbols are less uniform than other categories. Examples include the statue of Nero the lion on George Wombwell's tomb, the horse statue on John Atcheler's grave (horse slaughterer to Queen Victoria). Also, other examples such as the book motif on the grave of publisher Frederick Warne, cricket bats for Frederick William Lillywhite, paint pallet for George Hering, the horseshoes and whip on the grave of record-breaking coach driver James Selby and the canon shaped railing posts on the Otway mausoleum.

Some depictions of flora and fauna are included in the section about religious motifs because they have overt or subtle Christian meanings including the lamb, the dove and the passionflower. Or they were discussed alongside other classical symbols because they have a strong association with those cultures such as Laurel wreaths. Some depictions of animals have also been discussed above as tied to the lives of specific individuals. However, there is another category of floral and faunal depictions whose meaning is instead tied to Victorian Romanic ideals and the language of flowers, and they are discussed separately here.

Not all of the flowers could be identified as a definite species – some were drawn in a stylised way, and some were weathered or partially obscured by living vegetation. These were coded as 300 (flowers) and there are 18 examples at Highgate. Of the identifiable flowers passionflowers with their association to the Passion of Christ were the most common (nine examples), there were also eight examples of lilies, associated with purity, chastity and the Virgin Mary, and a very common choice for funeral flowers due to their strong scent (Keister 2004, 50), seven are roses associated with love and one motif is a poppy often associated with sleep (Keister 2004, 53-54).

The most common single floral symbol in the Highgate sample is ivy with 21 examples. Ivy is associated with binding ties of friendship and affection, the evergreen leaves make it a symbol of immortality and fidelity and the leaf shape with 3 large points reminded Victorians of the Holy Trinity (Keister 2004, 57). There are also seven other graves with leaves on them, some of which are very stylised but there are a few which look like oak leaves (associated with strength, endurance, and faith (Keister 2004, 62). There are also five graves with vines or grapes on them which may represent fruitfulness or the bond between God and man through the Eucharistic wine (Keister 2004, 57, 59).

Fauna symbols were not common at Highgate. In addition to Nero the Lion, Lion the dog (Tom Sayers pet) and Atcheler's horse there are two doves (Christian symbol of peace because of the story of Noah's ark). There is also one stylised bird motif (on HGE10.5 dated 2001) and the depictions of lions on the doors of the Beer mausoleum. Lions are associated with courage, majesty and strength. They may also be a symbol of resurrection due to the ancient belief that lion cubs were born dead and came to life after 3 days when the male lion breathed on them (Keister 2004, 74).

The widespread use of floral symbols at Highgate across samples, found in all periods 1839-1914, shows that these symbols were popular, and they were probably widely understood as meaningful. There is a slightly smaller proportion of these designs in the 'notable' graves sample, perhaps due to the preference for more specific and personal symbolism.

7.3.6 Inscriptions

As well as the pictorial motifs on memorials, the wording chosen must also be analysed. The introductory phrasing of an inscription, and the phrase chosen to describe death, can be used to analyse attitudes towards death in the sample. The way people are described and how their interpersonal relationships are noted will also be explored. There is also a subset of inscriptions which include a longer epitaph which can undergo further analysis.

Introductory phrases and death terminology/mortality phrases

Sometimes the first words on a memorial are the name of the deceased, but in most cases, there is an introductory phrase before the first name, for example 'In Memory Of' and there may be another phrase used before each name on the stone such as 'Also of'. The name of the deceased is usually followed either by the date of birth and date of death, or by date of death and age at death. Sometimes the dates occur without any wording, but usually there is a phrase which indicates death, for example 'died', 'passed away', 'fell asleep in Jesus'.

These phrases can indicate the attitudes to death which were prevalent at the time, including religious belief, sentimental feelings and metaphors for death which might provide distance or comfort for the bereaved. These graphs (figure 137 and 138) show the chronological pattern of the use of these phrases.

As Figure 137 shows there were some graves which had only names and no introductory phrases at all, but it was relatively common to use an introductory phrase. The most popular phrases used to introduce a name were 'Also of' or 'And of' used before the next name in a list of names on a gravestone – in fact in was rare to find a grave in the sample which had multiple burials which did not use these phrases especially in the main period of study up to 1914.

The most common phrase used for the first name on a gravestone were 'In Memory of' or 'In Remembrance of' and variations thereon such as 'In Loving Memory' (183 examples) and 'In Affectionate Remembrance' (42 examples). The popularity of this phrasing is unsurprising because the memory of the deceased, and the consolation of good memories, was central to the grieving process for Christians and non-believers alike in the 19th century (Jalland 1996, 284). Brooks describes the 19th century as the 'Age of the Beautiful Death' where irreparable loss was made tolerable only through these cherished memories (2001, 213).

In the 19th century another commonly used phrase was 'Sacred to the memory of' and variations thereon, but this was not seen often in the 20th century and was only seen once after 1942. References to the body, mortal remains, or ashes were rare and totally absent after 1900. There weren't many graves with an inscription of 'Family Grave' (or Private grave and other variations such as family vault or family tomb) at Highgate and most were from the 19th Century, despite the fact that nearly all of the graves in this sample are private graves used by members of a single family, it was not often felt necessary to state this in the inscription. The use of the Latin phrase 'In Memoriam' was very rare (6 examples) and was not seen at all after 1916.

Figure 138 shows that the vast majority of the gravestones in the Highgate sample, especially before 1948, simply stated 'Died', and some graves in all time periods used only the date of death with no wording at all. The graph shows the other phrases which are used as euphemisms for death in the sample. Early on the most common of these is 'Departed this life' but this is not seen much at all in the 20th century. The use of 'Fell Asleep in Jesus' is also limited to the 19th century, not occurring at all after 1900. More general references to sleep and rest such as 'Fell Asleep' and 'Entered into Rest' and the vague euphemism 'Passed Away' all begin around the same time in the sample between 1869-1878 and continue into the middle of the 20th century, their appearance corresponding to the beginnings of the shift towards a greater focus on peaceful deaths (Jalland 1996, 53). The phrases 'Called home' and 'Went Home' are rare and only appear after WWI. The use of 'Ob.' or 'Obt' as Latin abbreviations for Obiit (died) are rare (two examples) and only seen early in the sample period. There are a few graves where the cause of death is mentioned – including two people 'lost at sea', one 'killed accidentally' and some phrases relating to war deaths. These are mostly 'killed in action' (five examples 1914-1918 and one from 1900), one who 'fell in the great war' and one 'missing presumed dead' also from WWI. It is assumed that most or all of the war dead are centotaphs only, recording burials which took place elsewhere, as repatriation was uncommon (except where wounded soldiers died in British hospitals).

Overall, the choice of wording on the gravestones reveals a few things about changing attitudes to death. The use of overtly religious phraseology is mostly confined to the 19th century, which fits with increasing secularisation of society and death in the 20th century. The early date at which Latin is discontinued also fits with this, as Latin was often associated with religious services, particularly in High Anglican and Catholic churches. Before the 1860s and after the 1960s it was rare to use euphemisms for death, suggesting that using metaphors of rest or sleep for death was most prevalent in this period. Acknowledgement of the physical remains was not common at Highgate, and not seen at all in the 20th century, perhaps reflecting Victorian squeamishness about this topic and increasing distance from the physical realities of death in the 20th century. Two of these examples ‘here lies the body of’ and ‘herein lie the ashes of’ are on the graves of known agnostics (George Eliot and Herbert Spencer) and so may be a deliberately indicating the finality of death. WWI also had a marked impact on attitudes to death, with families feeling the need to commemorate the violent death of service personnel, perhaps because repatriation of the body was rare. It is likely that if the date for the ‘notable’ graves sample had been extended past 1914 then this may have been more apparent. The post 1939 sample is very small, so it wasn’t possible to look at the impact of WWII.

Relationships commemorated

The way in which individuals are described in relation to other people is revealing, showing how the persons commissioning the memorial wanted them to be remembered. The prevalence of different descriptors in the Highgate sample is given below in table 29.

The results are based on only on those graves which had legible inscriptions and the results are divided by gender. Where a gender-neutral term was used e.g. child, the name of the deceased was used to determine which category to use.

In the Highgate sample it was usual to include a relationship (almost always a familial relationship as shown above) along with names, with these stated in 58% of legible inscriptions. It was twice as common to include a familial relationship if the deceased was female than if the deceased was male.

The most common relationship stated was ‘wife’ with 301 women listed as such, along with 88 widows and 6 relicts (a now defunct term which also means widow). By contrast there are only 45 husbands and no widowers. This is probably partly due to the greater likelihood of women outliving their husbands, but also due to the gendered way that the loss of a spouse was experienced in this period, for example men were much more likely to remarry (Jalland 1996, 230). Once again, contrary to Mytum’s findings (2004a, 128) women in the Highgate sample are far more likely to be defined by marital status than their relationship to children.

There were lots of children referred to in relation to their parents with 214 ‘sons’, 150 ‘daughters’ and ‘child’ appearing 51 times. Many of these were under the age of 18, as infant mortality rates were sadly very high in the 19th century with many referred to as ‘infant’ as one baby listed only as ‘unnamed son’, aged 1 day, but adult children were represented too. There were also many inscriptions which listed children as ‘eldest child’ ‘youngest daughter’ or ‘2nd son’. It was much less common to refer to ‘mother’ (19 in total) or father (17 in total). There were also people listed as sister (21 examples) and brother (10 examples).

The range of other relationships listed was broad including aunt, uncle, niece, nephew, cousins, grandchildren and in laws, as well as a small number of friends and other non-familial relationships (total of 4 people listed by only non-familial relationships). There were also a few inscriptions which referred to multiple relationships, and this was more common for women (11 examples) than for men (3 examples).

The lack of 'family grave' inscriptions (noted above) in the Highgate sample may be because they weren't necessary if actual family relationships are listed so frequently.

When comparing the 'notable' graves to the rest of the sample, there is a distinct difference in how people are commemorated. Of the 72 notable people in that sample, only nine are referred to by familial relationships (13%) which is much lower than the sample average. Of these, four are women

(two referred to as wife, two as daughter) and the other five are men (three referred to as son, two as father and one as both). It is clear then that usually it is other aspects of their identify which those erecting monuments to 'notable' individuals want them to be remembered for- their personal achievements rather than their family connections. There are some exceptions to this such as when the parent or spouse is the more well-known individual as was the case for John Wordsworth (son of William Wordsworth) and Elizabeth Rossetti (nee Siddall, wife of Dante Gabriele Rossetti). Whilst there are more men than women with family relationships listed, the percentage is very different. Only 7% of the notable men had a familial relationship listed, but of the five 'notable' women in this sample 80% had a familial relationship listed. Only Mary Ann Cross, better known as George Eliot, can stand alone on her own merit whilst Christina Rossetti is referred to only as daughter (and her profession is not inscribed). The inscription for the novelist Ellen Wood is less of a surprise given that she was best known as 'Mrs Henry Wood'.

Longer epitaphs and additional information

Where there are longer epitaphs, these can provide even more information about the deceased and those responsible for their memorials. Not all memorials have longer epitaphs, and not all of those which did remain legible. For those which could be read, the information was divided into 4 main categories and listed in the table 30 below.

Table 30 Summary of information given about the deceased in inscriptions at Highgate

	Profession or titles	Address or place of residence	Other biographical information	Longer epitaph
'Notable' people (67)	43	13	17	29
Surrounding sample people (1553)	189	179	199	411
Random sample people (35)	0	8	2	8

Between 12% and 14% of the total sample had some additional information about the deceased, and 27% had a longer epitaph of some kind. There was a wide range of professions listed including military ranks, membership of professional bodies such as the Royal Academy as well as titles such as Baronet. Addresses were often quite general e.g. 'Of Holloway' or 'Of Highgate' but there were also street names, and even house names or numbers recorded on a number of gravestones.

The other biographical information given was usually place of birth, place of death or information about the person being buried elsewhere. Sometimes other information such as cause of death, the fact the person was cremated, who erected the monument and other information about family members not interred here such as parental profession were listed. There was one single grave (dated 1997) which used the phrase 'nèe' to list a woman's maiden name. On the occasions where a married woman's maiden name was given it was usually done instead by listing her as 'daughter of' in the same way as for unmarried women and children'.

A much higher percentage of the inscriptions for the 'notable' people contain extra information – in particular information about the profession or titles which appear in 64% of their inscriptions, 19% included an address or place of residence, 25% included other biographical information and 43% which had a longer epitaph of some kind. This once again shows that it was considered more important than for others buried in this cemetery to give detailed information about their life on the memorial, ready to be viewed by visitors.

At Highgate the longer epitaphs can be summarised into the following main categories: Sentimental (including poetry and literary quotations of a non-religious sentimental nature), Religious (bible quotes, hymns etc.), Death (cause, place, manner etc.), Life (places born, lived, family etc.) and Achievements (personal and professional) and who the memorial was erected by. These are summarized in table 31.

Table 31 summary of epitaph categories in Highgate sample (n=478)

294	155	7	8	4	10

There are slightly fewer epitaphs in this table than listed above because some of the epitaphs fitted into more than one category, a small number were also excluded for illegibility. Of those which could be read, around 62% were religious and Christian in character and around 32% were sentimental, with very few other epitaphs. Of those which mentioned the death of the individual nearly all referred to their place of burial and there were only a small number (10 examples) which gave details about who they were erected by and why, a contrast to Tarlow's findings at Orkney where a majority of gravestones included this information (1999, 66) perhaps because this was of less importance outside of a small community where the names of both the deceased and those who erected their memorial would be well-known. The only patriotic epitaphs were in HGW8 for the Polish exiles.

The religious epitaphs ranged from short phrases to longer bible quotes, but there were several common themes. A number of the epitaphs referred to the deceased as blessed, with god or in heaven such as ‘Blessed are the dead who died in the lord’ ‘The memory of the just is blest’ ‘With Christ which is far better’ and ‘In God’s Keeping’. There were a number which referred to God’s will or love for the deceased such as ‘Thy will be done’ and ‘He giveth his beloved sleep’. There were some inscriptions chosen for children specifically including ‘suffer little children’ and ‘of such is the kingdom of heaven’.

For those graves which expressed less obviously religious wishes, many of the epitaphs had sentiments about rest, sleep and peace, including ‘At rest’, ‘Life’s work well done, now comes rest’, ‘Sleep on beloved, sleep on and take thy rest’ and ‘Peace. Perfect Peace’. There were also epitaphs which referenced family reunion although it was not directly stated if this was in the grave or in an afterlife such as ‘Til we meet again’ and ‘In their death they are not divided’ and ‘Reunited’. There was also a focus on loss and memory such as ‘gone but not forgotten’ and longer verses including ‘a light from our household is gone, a voice we loved is stilled, a place vacant on our hearth, can never be filled’. Many sentimental epitaphs focused on the good qualities of the deceased and how much they were loved – especially ‘loved’ or ‘beloved’, ‘devoted’, ‘affectionate’ and ‘kind’. A number of people were ‘deeply lamented’, ‘regretted’ or ‘mourned’. For children, there were some references to flowers for example ‘a fair blossom gathered in the bud’. The ‘notable’ people were equally likely to have a religious or a sentimental epitaph (10 of each), but were unusually likely to have an epitaph praising their life and achievements (6 out of the 12 examples), none had an epitaph which referred to their death but 3 had references to the people responsible for erection of the monument.

7.4 Factors affecting the style and form of monuments to ‘famous’ individuals

This section explores the reasons why some of the differences between the ‘notable’ graves and those which surround them might exist, even in cases where the plot itself would have cost the same such as two neighbouring plots of the same dimensions alongside the same pathway.

As chapter 5 showed, the ‘notable’ dead were more likely to be honoured with larger and taller monuments, in prominent locations. This is confirmed by the analysis in section 7.3.3. which showed that on average the monuments to the notable dead were taller by just over 60cm compared to those around them and were also larger in all other dimensions. The record books and maps at Highgate indicate that the price of each plot depended on the size and that the areas along main pathways were usually reserved for these larger plots. There is no indication in the records that the cemetery company placed any control over that monuments were constructed on the larger plots along the main pathways, but it is possible that they did put some conditions in certain circumstances, for example at Kensal Green plots on the centre road would only be sold if the cost of the monument to be erected was at least £200 exclusive of the price paid for the ground (Curl 2001d, 108). Regardless of any restrictions, purchasing one of these plots is already a display of wealth, and building larger monuments which cover more of the plot, as well as taller ones are also likely to add additional expense. The 'notable' graves sample contains a high proportion of pedestal tombs and mausoleums, as well as catacombs which were the most expensive and exclusive burial plot option at Highgate.

This chapter shows that the 'notable' dead were also more likely to be commemorated using monuments made from expensive materials like white Italian marble and coloured granites. Their monuments also showed a greater complexity of materials used, larger numbers of decorative motifs and longer inscriptions. Choosing more expensive materials, using more than one for many monuments, plus larger amounts of carving for both decorations and lettering would have all increased the price charged by the stonemason.

This suggests that the grave was a site of conspicuous consumption, where the expense of the memorial could reflect positively on the deceased and the people responsible for commemorating them. Julius Beer's mausoleum was certainly created in part to show that despite humble origins in Frankfurt, his success as a newspaper tycoon made him as wealthy as the London High Society who didn't make him feel welcome (Beach 2011, 48). It therefore seems likely that this was a motive for at least some of the other memorials to the significant dead and other monuments more widely in the cemetery.

We know from other sources that display of wealth influenced other aspects of funerary practice for example the vehicles used in the funeral procession, the coffin and coffin furniture, but that it wasn't only wealth, but also social status which influenced the choices made by families, with etiquette around what was considered appropriate for different groups within Victorian society (Litten 2002), and thus it can be assumed this was the case with monuments too.

However, mausolea in particular have often been shown to 'reflect wealth over status' and could 'create an aura of an established social position which may have not been accurate.' (Mytum 2004a 123) with the newly affluent middle classes throughout the industrialised world 'solidifying their dynastic success in a family mausoleum' (Mytum 2004a, 72). This is a crucial reminder that cemeteries don't just passively reflect social change, they are also an arena where tensions are actively played out (Mytum 2004a, 121).

The graves which make up the 'notable' sample differ from those buried nearby in terms of social status at their time of death, due to public perception of their perceived talents – giving them a degree of notoriety, fame or even 'celebrity' status. This also allowed people of relatively humble means to be commemorated in an elite cemetery with an appropriately lavish memorial if there was public interest in their life and death – for example Tom Sayers the pugilist who died in relative poverty but whose funeral was attended by 10,000 people and whose monument was paid for by public subscription (Historic England 1999l). The people responsible for building the memorials to these individuals knew that their names would be familiar to many visitors and wanted to ensure that they continued to be remembered in this way.

This explains why there is a higher prevalence of memorials which commemorate the profession or talents of the deceased either in the inscription or in the motifs chosen. It also explains why different relationships are likely to be stressed for the significant dead than for ordinary men and women. Rather than being remembered solely for their personal relationships for example as loving parents or devoted children, they are more likely to be remembered for their professional life or personal achievements. Where family ties are emphasised, they are more likely to be due to the overall status of the family for example the inclusion of family titles, crests and mentions of illustrious ancestors. The exception to this is the graves of 'notable' women, which are more likely to emphasise family relationships and ignore professional accomplishments.

Nearly all of the graves in Highgate cemetery, with the exception of the common graves, were sold for the private use of a single family, although as we have seen in this chapter there were rare examples of non-family members such as close friends being interred together. Although the commemoration of family relationships was not often the focus of epitaphs for the notable dead, it was relatively unusual for them to be buried alone, with only 14% of the sample having only 1 name on the monument (compared to 22% of the surrounding graves) and the monument in the sample which had the most names listed was Rossetti family grave with 14 people listed. This means that many of the notable graves, just like many graves in the rest of the cemetery, were personal sites of mourning for families, sometimes for several generations.

Out of 71 'notable' dead with surviving inscriptions, 29 had a longer epitaph, and of those 10 were sentimental (34%), broadly similar to the proportion on the surrounding graves (31%), suggesting that although these memorials did serve a public function, they were also sites of private grief for the family and that this was a factor in the design of the memorials. The memorial for Tom Sayers, paid for by public subscription, is an exception, containing no reference to his family at all.

The proportion of religious epitaphs for the 'notable' dead was also 34%, but this is much lower than for the surrounding graves where 64% of the inscriptions were of a religious nature. There were also fewer religious motifs (39% for the 'notable' monuments, 50% for the surrounding graves). This is likely to be partly because the memorials were used instead to convey information about the life of the person, rather than their religious beliefs. It is also however important to note that several of the figures in the sample e.g. George Elliot, Herbert Spencer, Michael Faraday held unconventional religious views for the era and therefore it would not have been appropriate to use conventional

Christian motifs or inscriptions on their memorials. In the case of most ordinary Victorians, the choice to follow the religious conventions of the day when erecting a monument was probably as much to do with societal expectations as the strength of personal belief, although in the same way as the sentimental elements discussed above, they no doubt provided a great deal of comfort to the bereaved.

7.5 Wider effects of monuments to 'notable' individuals on monumentality

At Père Lachaise it was shown that there were several instances where the monuments chosen for the significant dead, can be seen to have influenced the choices made for neighbouring memorials, both in terms of location as was demonstrated in Chapter 4, and in memorial design as was discussed in Chapter 6. At Highgate, we have already seen instances where the famous dead influenced the location of other graves in Chapter 5, but there is little evidence that they directly influenced the style and form of memorials nearby in the same way that was noted at Père Lachaise. Perhaps this is because in London, where the funeral trades were not strictly controlled, there were many competing stonemasons each with their own design book to choose from, giving those shopping for memorials many potential sources of inspiration.

7.6 Summary

This chapter detailed the monumentality of the sample graves at Highgate cemetery, including size, form, material, style, motifs and inscriptions, and the wider British context in which they were erected. Several key differences in the monumentality for the 'notable' dead and those in the surrounding graves were noted, especially with regards to size, material, motifs and inscription choices. The comparison of all the data gathered from the Père Lachaise and Highgate samples. Can be found in Appendix 4.

Chapter Eight - Interpretation

8.1 Introduction

This chapter explores a deeper analysis of both cemeteries, looking systematically at four key themes: space, ritual, power and monumentality. Examining how the creation and development of the landscapes and monumentality were reflective of the wider social influences of the era, but also how, in turn, the cemeteries influenced society. This analysis will call upon the work on theorists from several fields including archaeology, anthropology and sociology to construct an interdisciplinary approach.

8.2 Space

In chapter 2 we considered that all spaces are socially constructed, and that the meaning of spaces isn't constant, but instead varies across time, location and depending on the audience. Throughout this section we will be asking Rapport's key questions 'Who does what, where, when, including/excluding whom and why?' (1994, 466), to help understand cemetery space and social behaviour (e.g. in terms of privacy, accessibility, movement and way-finding), while also taking account of his differentiation of 'high level' (e.g. world view, the sacred), 'middle level' (e.g. identify, status, wealth) and 'low level' meanings (1994; 473).

In Chapters four and five we have seen how from similar initial inspirations and starting points, the landscapes of Père Lachaise and Highgate began to diverge over time due to pressure from different world views and social behaviours expected in them. The romantic garden cemetery landscape which was eventually replaced by a 'city of the dead' at Père Lachaise, remained largely intact at Highgate until overtaken by woodland growth following mid-late 20th century neglect. Whilst the streets lined with mausolea became an idealised reflection of the city of Paris, the British continued to value natural beauty as morally improving (Tarlow 2000a, 228) and more importantly as a creating a comfortable and attractive place to lay loved ones to rest, and to remember them in - a sentimental and emotional landscape (2000a, 233).

Cemeteries have two main but potentially conflicting purposes. Private grief, including funerals and visits to a specific grave by the bereaved are part of the primary function of a cemetery as a space for burial but from their inception both Père Lachaise and Highgate were also designed as public spaces for education and leisure. These visits might be general tourism or a kind of secular pilgrimage, primarily motivated by one grave. They might also be the result of wider visitor interests such as botany or sculpture.

The cemetery is a space for individual remembrance, by the friends and family of the deceased, although for the 'notable' dead, this can sometimes become a secondary focus, as we saw in appendix 4, because the cemetery is also a space for the production of collective memory. They are designed to showcase memorials to the great and good, acting as mnemonics for the cultural values of the era. Therefore, cemeteries are places for remembrance and the creation of new meaning as part of both public and private rituals. We also know that experience of the space will also depend on other factors such as age, gender, social status and religious background. For example, Jews at Père Lachaise originally had their own gate to access the cimitiere des Israelites (Brown 1973, 26).

One approach to exploring different perspectives, interpretations and emotions in practices would be to use phenomenological studies of funerary events and other kinds of agency within cemetery landscapes (see Appendix 5 for two illustrative examples), but this would require far larger-scale comparative analysis than is possible here. Interpretations of the spatial organisations, properties, and qualities of the cemeteries in this chapter will focus instead on aspects of funerary ritual, monumentality and social identity and power.

8.3 Ritual

As we have seen in chapter 2, ritual is not easy to define, because the array of practices which constitute ritual across the globe and through time are vast and not always easy to identify, especially in the archaeological record. Cemeteries were used for a variety of rituals, both formal and informal. Tending the grave of a loved one is a ritual, so is making a pilgrimage to the memorial of a famous figure who was admired in life. Gatherings on anniversaries or other significant dates for wreath laying or speeches are ritualised events, often used by the state or groups with a political agenda. Lighting candles on graves for All Souls Day or covering them with flowers on Palm Sunday are religious rituals. In fact, rituals which fall into all six categories of ritual identified by Bell (1997; 94) are likely to take place in cemeteries.

Funerals are the main type of ritual around which cemeteries are designed, although funerary ritual can show great variability even within a single cemetery, both across time and because they served different functions for different individuals or sections of the community. Funerals are widely accepted as 'rite of passage' rituals, and so can be explored using the threefold model created by van Gennep (1960) and later developed by Turner (1974), Lincoln (1991) and Garwood (2011). Rituals can also be viewed as performances (Geertz 1980, Turner 1982) on a spectrum between entertainment and efficacy depending on their purpose, where they were enacted, by whom and under what circumstances (Schechner 1994, 622), and as redressive parts of wider 'social dramas' (Turner 1982, 10).

Funerals at Père Lachaise and Highgate will now be considered through these analytical lenses. Accounts of funerals are rare, especially when compared to accounts of deathbeds and dying, perhaps because mourners were too shocked and disoriented to record personal responses (Jalland 1996, 217) and so it is difficult to know exactly how closely the usual practices were followed for individual funerals.

Death, like birth, is one of the rites of passage which no one can avoid. However, the form which funerary rituals take is as variable as any other event cross culturally. Even between Paris and London there were as many differences as similarities, and within each city the cultural norms for funerary rituals vary greatly depending on the individual circumstances surrounding the death and burial. We can use the threefold model to investigate the different stages of the rituals and identify some of the ways in which the cemeteries were designed to accommodate these symbolic and physical journeys.

The rites of separation begin, in many cases, before death has actually taken place. In both Paris and France at this time it was customary, unless death was sudden and unexpected, for there to be a number of deathbed rites, which begin the severing of ties between the living and the dead. The type of medical care, if any, might discontinue or change to acknowledge that the battle for life was now being lost. Family and friends would gather to pay their last respects and say goodbye and depending on the beliefs of the dying a clergyman might be summoned to administer the last rites. However, as Kselman (1993, 97) and Ben-Amos (2000, 280) in France and Jalland (1996, 18) for Britain have noted, even for the religious, the role of the clergy was much less important in ensuring salvation than the actions of the dying themselves, and instead a 'good death' was surrounded by family. In the case of a public figure, rites of separation might take place elsewhere too, such as crowds gathering outside the house to show their concern and respect as was common in France or attending church services to pray for the dead or dying as was seen for some public figures in Britain during the 19th century (Wolfe 2000, 6).

The moment of death could be seen to mark the beginning of the liminal phase but many of the rituals immediately following death could still be seen as rites of separation, marking a transition from the deceased as a member of the household into a corpse. It was customary for the body to be washed and dressed, a task which almost always fell to women. In ordinary households this might be the female relatives or family friends of the deceased, or for those who could afford a nurse to attend to the needs of their dying relative, 'laying out' was part of the services for which they were trained (Jalland 1996, 211-212).

The deceased might be initially dressed in a white nightgown and lie in bed (Jalland 1996, 212) before the body was shrouded and placed in the coffin, which was usually sealed within 2 days, depending on weather and if scattered family had all been able to return to view the body.

The opportunity to view the deceased was seen as an important part of saying goodbyes, and the family and friends would often sit with their loved one (Jalland 1996, 212-213). Drawings and sometimes death masks (Jalland 1996, 46, 212, Hugo 1907, 201) or later photographs were taken of the deceased as a private final record, or in wealthy families for more public uses such as by artists.

The shroud was a long garment which fastened at the back and covered the feet. It had long sleeves and was tied at the waist and would be accompanied by a cap worn on the head (Litten 1991, 79-80). These garments were reminiscent of both nightgowns and Christening gowns, appropriate given the common metaphors of death as sleep and as a return to God. The coffin would also contain a mattress and coffin sheets which were laid over the body (Litten 1991, 79-80), making it all the more like a bed.

It was usual for the deceased to remain at home until the funeral, but public figures might lie in state in another location, to allow the public to visit them. This was rarer in Britain, but was more usual in Paris (Kselman 1993, Ben-Amos 2000). The end of the rites of separation can be marked by the coffin leaving the house and beginning the 'final journey' by to processing towards the grave.

However, it is not quite so straightforward, because other actions immediately after death, such as drawing the curtains, placing a wreath on the front door, stopping clocks and covering mirrors (Frisby 2019) suggest that there was an awareness that the deceased has entered a different, liminal state and that this needed to be managed. However, some customs, such as the wearing of mourning clothes, might not begin until the day of the funeral, perhaps suggesting that the mourners do not enter a liminal state until then.

The journey was usually via a church or cemetery chapel for a service before another procession to the graveside for the internment of the coffin. The distance between home and the new cemeteries encouraged use of hearses and mourning carriages for the procession, a journey which in rural areas was usually still made with the coffin carried by hand or on a wheeled bier (Litten 1991, 120). In Paris, pallbearers walking in the procession is mentioned in the above account (Hugo 1907, 202), and in London it was common to have pages with tipstaffs alongside the hearse and a featherman in front of it (Litten 1991, 30). A funeral procession moving through the city slowly with highly decorated vehicles and participants in mourning dress would disrupt everyday routines, forcing people to stop and wait respectfully for it to pass. Spectators had been an important part of funerary rituals since the heraldic funeral of the Middle Ages, which aimed to gather as many prayers as possible for the deceased. Although after the reformation it was no longer believed that prayers for the soul were needed to reduce time in purgatory (Litten 1991, 6-8) the tradition remained important, perhaps as a way for the community to acknowledge the collective loss and grief caused by the death.

The number of spectators, as well as the size and elaboration of the procession, is one of the key differences between the funerals of 'notable' figures with a public profile and those of the same class without one. Their deaths caused more disruption and emotional impact on a much wider community of people, not just those who lived close by or knew the deceased personally, and so many more people, often thousands, felt compelled to witness the funeral.

In London, it was not unheard of for the funerals of well-known figures such as Tom Sayers, the champion pugilist, to attract 10,000 or more spectators. The largest non-royal state funeral in Britain during the period of study, for Wellington attracted a crowd of up to one and half million people (Wolfe 2000, 44). In Paris, state and other large public funerals were deployed regularly to great effect, with the funeral of Thiers is estimated to have attracted between 400,000 and 1 million people (Ben-Amos 2000, 183). In Paris, public funerals were certainly used to influence public opinion and legitimise regimes (Ben-Amos 2000) and it can be argued were also used in Britain to similar ends; for example, the state funeral of Wellington was used to influence the national mood at a time when there was fear of fresh threats from France (Wolfe 2000, 41-43). Although for ordinary funerals a newspaper notice might be published to inform scattered friends and family of the date of the funeral so they could attend, for large public occasions, tickets were required for admission to the service or cemetery.

Therefore, the experience of the funeral procession differed based on the viewpoint of the spectator or participant, with no one person able to experience everything. The order of the procession was also strictly controlled, with the chief mourner or mourners closest to the deceased, and then others following behind in order of status. For ordinary funerals, this order was usually based on the closeness of personal relationships, but for more public funerals there could be lots of vying for position to ensure that the right message was portrayed by the procession (Ben-Amos 2000, Wolfe 2000).

After the procession, the next threshold the funeral crosses is when entering the church or cemetery, moving from a mundane space where normal rules were temporarily suspended by the passage of the procession, into a special or sacred space (whether the cemetery was consecrated or not). In Britain, although funeral services varied according to religious affiliation, 'the burial-service of the Church of England was used fairly widely by many sects, and was by far the most common among these Victorian families.' (Jalland 1996, 216). At Catholic and High Church funerals a communion service was held after the first part of the funeral service (Jalland 1996, 220). In France, it was more common than in England for funerals to be entirely secular, but for most people it was still expected that the funeral would include a Catholic church service, the ringing of the church bells to announce the death to the Parish and prayers at the graveside, unless the deceased had been staunchly anticlerical or refused last rites (Kselman 1993, 103).

After the service, unless the burial is to take place within the church, or as in the case of some cemeteries like West Norwood, in catacombs beneath the chapel, the procession would now move on again to the graveside. The procession might still have some distance to travel from the church to the cemetery, or the distance might be much shorter from the chapel to the graveside. In all cases, once the procession was within the cemetery it would be a more intimate affair, with few if any uninvited spectators. It was usual for a final service to take place at the graveside with prayers and eulogies before the coffin was lowered into the grave and soil was placed onto it.

The graveside is where the dead transition into a post-liminal state, where death becomes final and reintegration takes place, with the deceased joining the community of the dead, and often a heavenly reunion with God. In common graves, the deceased was joining the broad collective of the dead, which in France fitted with the post-revolutionary ideals of egalité and fraternité. A private cemetery like Highgate was still an exclusive burial location and so even a common grave would have been 'good company' to be in. In the case of family graves, this was also a moment when the family was reunited, both in the earth, but also for many families this also represented a spiritual reunion.

The funeral ritual would then end with the mourners leaving the cemetery and returning to the ordinary social world. This was often followed by additional rituals to help with reintegration such as the offering of hospitality to the attendees. Although in Britain this depended on class as Jalland notes 'Certainly the working-class culture of death still made much of the feast, as Ruth Richardson has shown. But the significance of the funeral meal was greatly diminished among these nineteenth-century professional and upper-class families.' (1996, 223) who might offer refreshments or a meal at the family home only to the chief mourners, or those who had travelled to attend the funeral (Jalland 1996, 223).

Although the overall form of the ritual might be broadly the same, there are many points where variation could occur, depending on the belief of the participants and their social status. Many elements of the funeral are invisible in the archaeological record, and might leave only the faintest traces in the historical record (e.g. any details recorded in the burial register, newspapers or any personal papers such as mourning cards, letters of condolence and diaries). However, we can glean some idea as to what the beliefs of individuals were, and how their social status might have been reflected in their funeral, by looking at the monuments erected to them which often contain inscriptions and symbolism which shed light on these aspects (see appendix 4).

It must also be noted that as well as the distinctions made above about the division between the public procession and the private funeral service and burial, experience of funerals also varied for mourners based on their age and gender. It was not usual for children to attend funerals – normally saying their last respects and staying behind when the funeral procession left home. In the early and mid-Victorian periods in Britain, women did not usually attend upper- and middle-class funerals, or if they insisted in attending they 'must take their seats in the church before the service, but must not participate in the funeral procession.' (Jalland 1996, 221) and there was criticism of the custom of female relatives attending poorer funerals. By the 1870s there was sometimes a compromise reached where widows could attend the funeral service but then return home instead of continuing to the graveside (Jalland 1996, 221) and by the 1890s it was more common for women to attend funerals of their relatives (Jalland 1996, 221). The restriction on women attending funerals was because although the Victorians embraced the comfort of weeping in private grief, it was necessary to show emotional restraint in public. Women who did attend funerals were cautioned against sobbing, fainting or otherwise disrupting the solemnity with emotional displays.

Funeral practices did not remain static through the time period either and varied to some degree in France with each successive regime for public funerals, although the funerals of non-public figures were more constrained and consistent due to the strict control of funeral classes (Kselman 1993, Ben-Amos 2000). In Britain, as noted in chapter 7, the upper and professional classes moved away from some of the excesses of funerary display by the end of the century, whilst these increased somewhat for the working classes. The use of flowers, especially the fashion for sending wreaths to cover the coffin, grew in popularity as funeral ceremonies became less elaborate in other ways. (Jalland 1996, 222-223).

Although some families left personal accounts which expressed comfort gained from the process of the funeral or the words of the service, it was also commonly considered to be an ordeal (Jalland 1996, 219). This might apply equally in any time, due to the difficult emotions experienced by those grieving, but perhaps the trappings of the funeral were also partly to blame. Many of the original elements of the funeral procession, as seen in England were derived from pre-reformation heraldic funerals, and their meanings had become opaque by this time (Litten 1991, 30). It could be argued that much of this was now empty pomp, much more about display of power and social status, than about grief or comfort to the mourners.

8.3.2 Funerals as performance

With this in mind, in becomes clear that many elements of the 19th century funeral are closer to 'entertainment' than 'efficacy' on Schechner's continuum between ritual and theatre (1994, 6-16). The fashions for funerals processions in both Britain and France included a lot of theatrical scene dressing, with plumed horses and fabric swathed coaches, with mourning clothes as costumes for the participants and even use of professional actors; those employed by the undertaker such as pages and mutes.

Funerals are a ritual where grief is 'played out' and seen publicly, and the performative element of funerals encouraged these emotions within the collective, with the help of professionals to set the mood, which was solemn, dignified and sad. This could be cathartic, a ritual which helps accept death as a reality, but within the public performance of grief real emotions were also constrained. This is demonstrated by the disapproval of widows weeping and fainting at funerals, although these reactions were thought to be natural and expected, they were not socially acceptable at funerals.

However, the fundamental element of the funeral, the transfer of the body from the home to the place of burial, was vital to the family and their wider community for practical and hygienic reasons. Having a ritual which allows this to be accomplished in a respectful way, with whatever religious or other observances are thought appropriate, also helps heal the social rift left by the death.

Turner divides rituals into 'rituals of affliction' with a 'therapeutic' role, and 'life-crisis ceremonies' with a 'prophylactic' role (1982, 10). Funerals are usually seen as falling into the second category, a performance which prevents the death of a member from having a negative effect on the group. However, some funerals also played a therapeutic role. In Paris funerals were often politically charged events, aimed at reinforcing support for their orchestrators and maintaining social order often by using motifs from aesthetic art to hold a mirror up to events. State funerals in particular were elaborate pieces of political theatre, where the private family funeral was replaced by an act of state involving the government, media and public, used by the regime to orchestrate meaning with a 'complex interplay of memory and forgetting' (Ben-Amos 2000, 2).

Parisian state funerals in the 19th century are a particularly stark example, but all funerals which took pace in these cemeteries can be seen as an interplay between memory and forgetting. During the funeral performance and monumentalising rituals, the dead are idealised, certain parts of their identity are reaffirmed, while others are erased, perhaps creating an entirely new identity in death. It is clear that funerals and monuments are not passive reflections of the dead as they were in life, but conscious constructions that allow funerary rites to outlast the moment of their performance, making them into a material form (cf. Petts 2003, 194). Sometimes this is dramatic, like the funeral and monument of Victor Noir which forever cemented the image of him as a martyr, but every funeral and monument makes conscious decisions about the identity of the deceased which is portrayed.

8.4 Monumentality

The creation of monuments, especially to commemorate the dead, is a very old human practice and which has been utilised in many cultures globally and through time. Before the 19th century, in both France and Britain, the ability to erect funerary monuments was restricted to a privileged few, only those who could afford to pay for monuments in churches, in private vaults within churchyards, or on their own estates. In contrast, the creation of garden cemeteries where those purchasing a private grave had the right to erect permanent monuments, corresponded with increased relative prosperity brought to the growing middle classes by the industrial revolution and the wealth of resources flowing into these countries from their colonies, allowing a wider section of society to purchase a family plot and erect a monument.

At both Père Lachaise and Highgate, this right was often used by the relatives to create an idealised image of the family unit, but for notable figures their individual public image and achievements were often prioritised over their personal bonds. However, not all graves had the same right to erect a monument. Controls over which graves could be marked were also based on the decision about which identities can be visible within the cemetery and thus the collective dead. At Père Lachaise the poor were originally spatially segregated and had their options for monumentalising the dead limited in both time and scale, and then later all but the elite were excluded totally from the cemetery. At Highgate, paupers were always excluded, and the common graves of the working classes were unmarked, and so their individual identities were not part of the monumental landscape.

We can see that the worldview shifts which were occurring in the 19th century in both France and England were reflected in, and in some ways promoted by, the shifts in monumentality. In both countries, the majority of the deceased, with the exception of a small elite, had previously been subsumed into a collective dead within the churchyard,with bodies liable to undergo recirculation to allow reuse of the grave. In France bones were placed into the attics of charniers around the cemetery but charnel houses were rare in Britain after the reformation when masses for the dead were discouraged (Curl 1984, 223) and so instead remains tended to be placed in charnel pits below ground or reburied at the base of the new grave (Cherryson, Crossland and Tarlow 2012, 91-93). For centuries the church and churchyard had tied communities together, and in rural communities, they continued to do so for far longer, but in cities, the rapid population growth in the 18th and 19th centuries changed this. Having the dead nearby was no longer a spiritual and emotional comfort, but instead represented a physical danger and a source of horror. The elite had absented themselves and their loved ones from this as early as possible by choosing private or rural burial plots, but a wider solution was needed.

Monuments gave a feeling of security against unwanted disruption of the body and appealed to many families as a way of expressing their identity and demonstrating status, as demonstrated chapters 6 and 7. This widening of access to monumentality was also a catalyst for those with more wealth, and especially a higher public profile, to make their monuments stand out from the crowd – using larger and taller forms, more expensive materials and utilising motifs and inscriptions that explicitly demonstrated not only their financial resources but also their achievements and social status. At Père Lachaise, erection of monuments became an explicit strategy by the state and opposition groups vying for political power. Although state involvement was not seen at the privately owned cemetery in Highgate, the London elite did use the space to create a favourable image of themselves, and at least one monument, the Beer Mausoleum, was specifically built to demonstrate that the owner's success warranted respect from this elite, making this a likely motive for other monuments too. The cemeteries also demonstrate that the construction of these new elite identities were as dependant on who was excluded as who was included. This explains the either total exclusion of the poorer classes, or limitations imposed on monuments erected to them. At Highgate, even those working-class people deemed worthy of admission become invisible except in the burial register, but in France, the state ideals of liberté, egalité, fraternité, are typified by the 'monument aux morts' used to remember the collective dead whose remains have been transferred to the ossuary.

There are complex relationships between monumentality, time and memory, which is why monuments are often modified, altered, or destroyed. Rowlands and Tilley found that there was a 'continual dialectic between persons, practices and material structures' (2006, 511). This is why, as well as the addition of new burials to the cemetery landscape, there were continuous changes to the existing monumentality. Some graves were given whole new monuments, such as General Ney at Père Lachaise, many had new inscriptions or elements added to reflect additional burials and, in both cemeteries, some monuments were damaged or destroyed. At Père Lachaise, this was a more active process to allow grave reuse, but at Highgate, benign neglect also erased monuments and thus memories, as the samples in both cemeteries show. Some monuments in both cemeteries also used proximity to other monuments as a way to legitimise identities, either through connect to others of the same social group or professional network, or through imagined ties between kindred spirits. When Rowlands and Tilley called Haussmann's Paris a 'expression of triumphant middle-class values' (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 502) they could, just have easily been talking about Père Lachaise, or any other garden cemetery.

Both cemeteries can be seen as a microcosm of the way civic urban landscapes were being used in the 19th century, where monuments and other aspects of the built environment were used as a strategy to frame identity (Kaplan 1994, Mitchell 1988). This created conflict over who have the authority to 'create, define, interpret and represent collective pasts through the creation of place' (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 501) and led to the symbolic or physical neglect of monuments when there was regime change. In both Père Lachaise and Highgate, we see deliberate preservation of some monuments, while others are allowed to fall into disrepair. This is sometimes the result of continued maintenance and spending by descendants, but it is more usual for these decisions to be made based on their perceived importance to collective or national memory.

Therefore, although monuments are lieux de mémoire, projecting consciously held ideas about the past (Nora 1989) and a sense of permanence onto the landscape, denying that change takes place (Lowenthal 1985), they are actually often built after upheaval to cement new identities, resisting memory as much as they create it (Rowlands and Tilley 2006, 500). Therefore, just like funerary rituals, the identity displayed by monuments is not an objective reflection of the living person, but a subjective construction. For most gravestones in both cemeteries, this image was used by families to construct an idealised picture of their relative and the family as a whole and was primarily aimed at creating collective memory for the family and a way of expressing their grief. Tarlow's work in Orkney finds that the increased individualism during the 19th century means that it is not just the continuation of the family that matters, but the unique individuals within the family and the relationships between them which people want to preserve. Monuments were erected to help families locate and express sentimental attachments to their deceased members, reflecting an emergence of emotions which are 'characteristic of modern emotional life in the West' (Tarlow 1999, 174) which encouraged expressions of familial and romantic love.

Monuments are needed to construct these memories, because 'real memories' do not survive into history (Maleuvre 1999, 39), and so collective memory is used by a group to map their stories and worldviews on to a specific time and place, and to make a version of the past resonate with group members (Connerton 1989, 2006, Rowlands and Tilley 2006). At Highgate and Père Lachaise, we see that symbolism and inscriptions on monuments are used to project many aspects of identity including religious beliefs, especially about the afterlife, family ties and loving relationships, lifetime achievements and professional pride, and even in some cases the appearance of the deceased.

Artefact biographies show that the meaning of a monument is often not created once, but frequently it is altered on a number of occasions through additional 'inscriptional events' during the life of the monument (Mytum 2004b, 113), and may be changed again through refurbishment or replacement (Mytum 2004a, 174-175). Monuments have social lives, but most only experience short periods when they are 'socially active' (Mytum 2004b, 114) with intense use for grave visiting (Mytum 2004a, 174-175) followed by a time when they are only of 'generalised significance' as part of the wider cemetery context (Mytum 2004b, 115) with the individual monument experiencing almost total abandonment (Mytum 2004a, 174-175).

Studying this is an archaeological context can be difficult as many indications that a grave was actively visited and tended such as cleaning, leaving cut floral tributes and planting flowers are unlikely to be preserved. Although sometimes areas where moss and lichen have been removed or new applications of paint to lettering can show cleaning (Mytum 2004b, 118) it can be hard to know when and how often this occurred, outside of generalised assumptions e.g. annual cleaning of Catholics graves in Ireland is a widespread and longstanding tradition (Mytum 2004a, 175). Instances where families paid an annual fee for the cemetery company or another entity to tend the grave and add new planting (e.g. Kensal Green as detailed by Elliott 2001, 294) can further muddy perceptions as these monuments might potentially have appeared to be socially active for long periods when no grave visiting was taking place.

The clearest evidence for archaeologists of a continued biography are additional 'inscriptional events' when names and epitaphs were added. However, this is not as straightforward as assuming that every name represents a new period of social activity as some inscriptions may have been grouped together- for example where the first inscription is not for the earliest date of death because the monument was not erected until the head of the family died.

A thorough exploration of monument biographies within both samples would be an interesting opportunity for further research, as a way of exploring the ongoing agency of the bereaved and attempting to understand the rituals of grave tending practiced in the cemeteries. Monuments are especially useful for this analysis in comparison to other items of funerary material culture such as coffins which are generally only socially active for a short period when acute grief would allow the undertaker to have more control over the choices made by the family, in contrast monuments are usually erected 6-12 months after the funeral at a time when emotions are more balanced allowing active engagement with the design process (Mytum 2018, 89-91).

The unique nature of monuments to the 'notable' dead make this a particularly interesting avenue for exploration of exploring these memorials. These monuments are much less likely to lose their function and meaning and are more likely to see it transformed over time to a progressively more public audience. They are also more likely to be recovered if lost or repaired if damaged giving them a distinct new second social life (Mytum 2004b, 115). For example, the monument to Michel Ney at Père Lachaise (PLC2.1) is not the original memorial from when he died in 1815, having later been replaced at an unknown date. As well as Michel Ney the current monument is also used to commemorate 12 additional family members, the last of whom died in 1933, but it is still socially active as a tourist destination today. This example shows both the potential interest of and difficulties with a monument biography approach to interpretation of these samples.

8.5 Social Identity/Power

Many scholars have found that mortuary evidence is useful for understanding the structure of past societies. As demonstrated already in this chapter, although we cannot dismiss the private and emotional functions, social status and the display of wealth and power were important aspects of funerary practice in 19th century French and British societies. Durkheim, considered cemeteries 'collective representations', material forms used by the bereaved, not for private remembrance as a result of their natural feelings of loss, but publicly and visibly as a duty imposed on them by society (1995, 400, cited in Vanderstraeten 2009). Highgate and Père Lachaise can therefore be used to explore the collective consciousness of society in London and Paris at the time when they were created. Although the findings of this thesis are not as cynical as Durkheim about the role of grief and family relationships in the creation of cemetery landscapes and monumentality, we never the less find that, at least for the 'notable' dead, there is a significant public facing dimension to mortuary practices during these times.

French society during the period 1804-1914 was perhaps more complex than in Britain, especially due to successive changes of regime, all of which required legitimisation through rituals and monuments. Père Lachaise became an outdoor Pantheon and a key part of the cult of 'great men' with some funerals and gravestones having immense political and social importance, especially those of politicians, but the cult of great men also had places for artistic and literary figures, including those originally used to 'seed' Père Lachaise such as La Fontaine and Moliere.

Although the political situation in Britain was in many ways less unstable, the French revolution did act as an impetus for many social movements and encouraged nationalist sentiments about the importance of monarchy and Christianity to British identity. For example, the Anglican revival, which harked back to a Medieval past of gothic cathedrals rather than the 'pagan' past of the Classical world. Conversely, the French example also acted as a model for those wanting a more secular society for agnostic movements and also emboldened expressions of national identity in Scotland, Ireland and Wales.

Binford (1971) proposed that there was a relationship between the social rank of the deceased and the facets of social persona recognised in funerary rituals, such as, age, sex, social position, conditions of death, location of death, and social affiliation. All of these facets are commemorated in some proportion of the monuments in both the Highgate and Père Lachaise samples, with the greatest differences evident between the 'notable' dead and the wider cemetery populations in both cases. More facets of their social persona are commemorated, especially relating to their social position and affiliations, such as titles and profession using both inscriptions and decorative motifs. Saxe (1970) also argued that the social significance of the dead would affect the mortuary treatment, and that for people of greater social significance, the social personae represented in death would be those which represented their higher position and the expense of their less socially significant identities. This also holds true for the 'notable' men in both cemeteries with their professional life and personal achievements prioritised over their family relationships or have their role as an illustrious ancestor highlighted on monuments. For 'notable' women, the sample size is very small, but this pattern does not hold with their family relationships recorded at the expense of their public profile, showing once again, as already noted in this chapter, that gendered differences must be considered when developing theoretical frameworks.

Tainter, who developed Saxe's work, found a correlation in 90% of cases between social status and the degree of energy expenditure in mortuary rites (1978, 121). The findings at Père Lachaise and Highgate do indicate correlation between social status and the placement of tombs and construction of the tomb. The tombs for the significant dead are larger and taller, more prominently located in terms of both expense and visibility and represent a more significant material investment. This includes the types of materials chosen, the number of different materials used, the complexity of the design and also the use of sculptural elements which would have been the most expensive and time-consuming to produce. Parker Pearson cautions that the reason for this correlation can't necessarily be explained or understood (1999, 35), and this thesis, with its relatively small sample sizes cannot hope to be representative of the whole of either cemetery, and thus obscures many of the variations Parker Pearson saw at Cambridge between classes, religious denominations, and ethnic groups. Marx and Marxist scholars may offer one possible explanation for why this correlation exists, in that the 'notable' dead broadly belong to the class which controlled production and therefore were able to utilise larger 'deposits of social labour' (Lull 2000, 579) when erecting monuments.

8.6 Summary

Funerary practice in both Highgate and Père Lachaise can be seen as an interplay between private grief and public celebration, especially when looking at the variation between the 'notable' dead and other graves within the samples. The cemetery spaces were created to accommodate not only funerary rituals, but also leisure activities such as tourist visits and a phenomenological approach is useful when thinking about how people moved through and experienced the space. Funerary rituals and the monuments which act as material reminders of them, varied according to religious belief, personal preferences, social class, wealth and public profile during the period of study in both cemeteries. Experience of the cemetery space and monumentality was influenced by class and gender. Social status and power often determined the types and complexity of monuments erected to the dead, and which aspects of their identity would be emphasised. For most people their family ties, sentimental attachments and attitudes towards death would have the biggest impact on the way they were remembered, but for the significant dead, their private identity often took a backseat to their public profile.

Chapter Nine – Conclusions

9.1 Introduction

This thesis has looked at Père Lachaise and Highgate Cemetery, focusing on development of these sacred landscapes and the types of monumentality used therein, with a particular interest in the burials of significant individuals and any wider influence they had on the cemeteries. This chapter will explore the findings of this research, the wider implications of those findings and suggest further avenues of research which go beyond the scope of this thesis.

9.2 Findings

This thesis is built around an in-depth study of only two cemetery landscapes and from those cemeteries a relatively small number of burials and the monuments associated with them. There are some limitations to this method, especially when it comes to large scale and statistical analysis, but there are also strengths to this approach. This kind of detailed information is very hard to obtain on a larger scale, and the tight focus allow exploration of precise chronologies and individual motivations.

This section will outline what the key findings of the thesis are, systematically looking at the landscape of each cemetery, and then a comparative analysis of the two, before repeating this process for monumentality.

9.2.1 Landscape development at Père Lachaise

Analysis of the architectural designs for Père Lachaise and maps and other images which chart the subsequent development of the landscape from 1804 to 1914, show that the creation of the first garden cemetery was a complex and multifaceted project. In 110 years, the landscape at Père Lachaise underwent multiple changes which reflect the way that burial practices also evolved over this time frame. How the landscape at Père Lachaise developed across this entire timeframe has never been considered in a single publication before, with Etlin's seminal work ending the account in 1874, and no one has studied the potential importance of placement of individual graves within the landscape or what factors might have controlled this.

The idea of a garden cemetery was first suggested as a solution for the persistent issue of overcrowding which was experienced in Parisian churchyards and the perceived lack of respect for the dead which had characterised the post-revolutionary champs de repos. The designs for Père Lachaise show that many ideas about what constituted an ideal burial landscape should look like were considered in its creation. Père Lachaise was a direct expression of the society of early 19th century Paris.

By contriving a seemingly natural landscape in a rural setting beyond the edge of the city, the designers hoped to evoke the already familiar language of the Romantic 'English garden' style, which through use of cenotaphs, follies and occasional tombs like Rousseau's at Ermenonville had already become associated with tranquil and peaceful death to the French public, especially in artistic and literary circles. This fitted with current beliefs that nature, in particular a rolling landscape which was reminiscent of the Classical notions of Elysian Fields or Arcadian Paradise, could offer comfort to the bereaved and respect for the dead. The early maps of Père Lachaise show that this landscape garden style was created by reusing some of the features of the existing gardens of Mont Louis, but also softening some of the formal elements of the older formal French garden style and introducing new winding pathways instead.

The French wanted not only to portray themselves as the successors of Classical civilisation but also use the cemetery to uphold the revolutionary notions of liberté, égalité, fraternité by creating a community of the dead where all men were free and equal in death, a brotherhood where success was determined not by birth or wealth but by having upheld these ideals. The 'cult of the great men' which had been developing at the Pantheon was continued by seeding the landscape with eminent Pre-revolutionary figures, giving an aura of longevity and legitimacy not just to the landscape but also to the regime. The landscape then also links the two together by providing vantage points to consider the city from the summit of the cemetery.

The monuments of worthy individuals, often adorned with classical symbolism, dotted around the arcadian landscape, the aspirational but modest tombs of the temporary concessions and the rows the simple temporary markers for the ordinary Parisians in the fosses commune, are an expression of worldview upon the landscape. This is a sacred space where everyone can find a home in death, and where the virtues of 'great men' are celebrated and their place in the collective memory is assured, and where you can aspire to join their ranks by having a small monument raised to your virtues and renewing the lease as long as your descendants can afford to. However, it should also be noted that the area set aside for the public cemetery was always smaller than should have been expected from the 1804 decree and so Père Lachaise was always of a more elite character than the other new cemeteries opening around Paris.

Careful consideration was given in this landscape to public health concerns. The elevated hillside site, beyond the city limits, where graves are guaranteed to lie undisturbed for at least 5 years, was all to prevent 'miasmas' at the time thought to be the cause of disease.

The cemetery was embraced by Parisians and visitors alike. Those with loved ones there would tend their graves, planting gardens to enhance this earthly expression of their hopes for a deathly paradise. The wider public and tourists alike would visit to walk the paths, enjoy the garden and the views and to remember 'great men'.

The landscape did not retain its original character forever, as shown in chapter 4, the cemetery underwent a complex series of extensions, due to the popularity of the cemetery and the growing population of Paris, with the largest purchased in 1850 and laid out by 1862 having a substantially different character to the earlier sections.

The grid layout used in the newer part of the cemetery was partly because this area was flatter and so terraces and winding paths, however beautiful, were not the most practical layout for maximising grave space, but they also represent an ideological shift which has already slowly been taking place.

Families from the growing middle classes had taken far more to erecting a family tomb or mausoleum than had been originally predicted, meaning that more graves were covered with stone and fewer with gardens, gradually replacing the Arcadian idyll with a quietly dignified city of the dead. The cemetery was becoming a mirror of the city, and so it's unsurprising that the cemetery would undergo a reimagining at the same time that Haussmann was creating boulevards and avenues to transform Paris. The cemetery was also further secularised after 1881 when the original 1804 provision for separate but equal provision for different religions was abolished. This saw the demolition of the wall around the Jewish cemetery and the subsequent scattering of Jewish burials throughout the whole cemetery.

The cemetery had always been a space used to promote the memories of 'great men' but although the importance of leisurely strolls through the garden while studying the tombs continued, there was also increasingly a consideration of the impact of powerful political funerals processing through the space. The redesign of the area between the main entrance and the chapel to create an avenue of tombs, where there is a concentration of political and other 'notable' figures reflects this. We also see Père Lachaise redesignated as an exclusively elite cemetery, giving up entirely on the idea that all Parisians had an equal right to burial there, which had been loosely held to begin with. The fosses communes would move to other cemeteries, and temporary concessions were stopped in and only perpetual concessions, the most expensive option, would continue at Père Lachaise.

The location of the plots for the 'notable' dead shifted over time, reflecting these changes in how the cemetery landscape functioned. The locations chosen for early prominent figures are located on smaller paths or tucked inside bosquets, designed to become destinations in their own right while wandering the open landscape. They might be glimpsed from a distance and appreciated upon approach. Originally the main paths were reserved for temporary concessions and thus not chosen. Over time we start to see clusters of tombs which are placed close together to create visual associations between 'kindred spirits' and those who were friends in life. Later, locations often favour those which are immediately visible on main pathways and processional routes. The cemetery is more built up and so visual prominence is harder to achieve away from these locations.

9.2.2 Landscape development at Highgate Cemetery

The landscape development at Highgate Cemetery has been subjected to less analysis than Père Lachaise, with fewer available maps and accessible resources perhaps discouraging other scholars from seeking these answers. By combining archival sources with on the ground data from the cemetery, the chronology was established in previously unknown detail, although there are undoubtedly still some uncertainties.

The creation of private cemeteries owned by joint stock companies in Britain, like Highgate, was partly in response to the demand in urban areas for an alternative to the overcrowded churchyards, but whereas in Paris these was at attempt to initially allow all Parisians the right to burial in Père Lachaise, access to a plot at Highgate was always restricted to those who could pay for it. With respectable, but unmarked and shared common graves, still commanding a price which would have been beyond many families. Although those who could pay were keen to do so, easily accepting anonymity (which would likely have also been their fate in the churchyard) in return for access to the security and 'good company' of the cemetery, where their loved ones could lie in peace without continual shuffling of the soil to cram in another coffin. Later, municipal cemeteries would attempt to offer a truly inclusive option. There were also other factors to consider at Highgate and its contemporaries, especially the importance of freedom of religious expression in British cemeteries, with separate chapels and burial areas for different denominations.

At Highgate the landscape which was created visually incorporated the nearby St Michael's church giving the appearance that the church was part of the cemetery, and also utilised a mature Cedar of Lebanon tree from the previous estate as a cemetery feature to great effect. The winding paths gave the impression that the extent of the cemetery was much bigger than it was in reality, creating a landscape with interesting vistas revealed around many corners and a view across to the city at the summit.

The landscape development did include some small extensions and changes to the West Cemetery, but mostly grew by the addition of the East Cemetery across Swains Lane and the tunnel linking the two. The East Cemetery is laid out on a gentler slope and so there is no need for the cuttings and winding pathways of the West Cemetery, instead being laid out more simply with straight paths running vertically and horizontally within an enclosing loop of paths around the perimeter and another running almost straight from the top gate to the bottom gate. This layout would have been an efficient use of space, important in a cemetery where graves were in ever increasing demand due both to its own popularity and the growth of London. Despite the popularity of graves at Highgate, it retained some of its garden feel like other British cemeteries, as many of the monuments away from pathways were small headstones, with grass and planting between them and inside kerbs as natural beauty was still valued in this landscape of memory. This effect can be hard to appreciate due to the growth of self-seeded trees within the last 50 years and the current management as a woodland.

The influence of Loudon on British cemetery design is only seen in the newer 'East Cemetery' at Highgate, but this can also be indirectly attributed to the British understanding of hygienic and efficient cemetery management which lagged behind and therefore relied on examples from the continent for its development.

The sites chosen for the graves of the notable individuals tend to be located next to or visible from the pathways throughout the study period. With clusters occurring on all the major routes, although concrete examples of those who knew each other in life, or 'kindred spirits' being buried close to each other are rarer than at Père Lachaise. Although the political statement of the state funeral procession did not influence Highgate in the way it did Père Lachaise, visibility during funerals and to visitors was clearly an important factor for those with agency over the memorials to the 'notable' dead here too.

9.2.3 Comparative landscape analysis

There has been some debate among landscape scholars about the extent to which Père Lachaise influenced not the existence of, but the design chosen for British cemeteries, including Highgate specifically. This thesis compares the landscapes of the two cemeteries and finds many significant similarities in the originally designed landscape, although there is some later divergence away from this as the cemetery developed. The key elements of the Père Lachaise landscape –a hillside site with rond points and circular paths, winding routes on the slopes and straight avenues across the terraces are all seen at Highgate, and many of them are also found at the other Magnificent Seven cemeteries in London, resembling Père Lachaise more closely than other potential influences such as early British 'sublime' cemetery landscapes and existing public parks. Both cemeteries also see a significant move towards more simply and rigidly laid out designs in their newer extensions. In both cases this may be partly due to more gentle topographical features, and also reflect a desire to maximise burial space but also changing fashions for cemetery layouts. Another commonality of both cemeteries is that the orientation of graves was not usually E-W as in earlier Christian burial grounds, but varied, mostly according to the layout of the pathways and the cemetery boundaries.

However, the division of space for different types of graves is quite different between the two landscapes. At Père Lachaise the public cemetery was initially located all in one area with the temporary concessions along the pathways and the interior of the sections reserved for perpetual concessions, eventually the fosses communes and temporary concessions were removed and the sites bordering the pathways became the most prestigious. At Highgate, the common graves were never open to all, but were maintained throughout the study period as a lower cost option. Rather than being grouped all in one area, small groupings of common graves, usually in double rows which were later turned into pathways were scattered throughout both the Old and New Ground. Religious divisions at Highgate were subtly marked with a line of trees, and remained constant, but at Père Lachaise they were more rigidly enforced via walled or hedged enclosures, and then later totally abolished. There was no provision at Highgate for non-Christian religions as there was at Père Lachaise. Grave reuse at Père Lachaise, which did not occur at Highgate at all in the study period, created quite different management conditions, and impacted spatial patterns as new graves infilled older rows at Père Lachaise when untended graves were reclaimed. Differing social pressures on the landscapes would also lead to an increasing visual difference as Père Lachaise was allowed to become a more of 'city of the dead' dominated by monuments, whilst Highgate remained a garden cemetery where planting on and between graves was still of importance.

In both cemeteries, the graves of 'notable' people were likely to be clustered in areas of higher visibility to make them more prominent to visitors, although this pattern developed more strongly over time at Père Lachaise but was present from the beginning at Highgate. There was strong evidence of groupings at Père Lachaise which relate to figures who shared a profession, knew each other in life or were otherwise 'kindred spirits'. This was less common at Highgate with only a handful of discrete examples. Overall, there are substantial similarities in landscape design between the two cemeteries, but differences of management relating to the differing social background of France and Britain at the time. However, the influence of Père Lachaise on the landscape of Highgate cemetery cannot be disregarded.

9.2.4 Monumentality at Père Lachaise

The monuments at Père Lachaise were largely in good condition across the sample, as monuments which fall into disrepair are subject to grave reuse. This leads to a preservation bias towards public figures for whose graves remain socially active and so have more maintenance support. It also means that there is a significant difference in monument condition and inscription condition, as weathered inscriptions are harder to preserve than the rebuilding of structural elements.

Classical monuments, with elements inspired by Roman, Greek and sometimes Egyptian architecture were the most common at Père Lachaise, and almost exclusively used for the 'notable' dead. This is probably due to the same reasons for the popularity of these styles for French architecture at the time – implying that their society was the direct successor of Classical civilisation and values. Gothic monuments, with heir clearer religious inspiration, were not uncommon in the wider sample during the 19th century, mainly mausolea, and there were also small numbers of monuments in other styles appearing later including Art Nouveau and Art Deco.

There was a large diversity of monument forms at Père Lachaise from flat ledger slabs to large mausolea but the most common types in the sample were pedestal tombs – forms which are taller than they are wide. Headstones and mausolea were the other common forms in the total sample, but the 'notable' graves rarely had headstones and low monument forms, favouring pedestal tombs very strongly. The monuments to the notable dead were on average larger and taller than those surrounding them, showing a deliberate effort to stand out from the crowd.

The monuments in the sample tended to be made from the local pale limestone which was an affordable material, well suited to carving and construction of monuments. The use of imported stone such as granite and marble, and more expensive materials such as copper alloys was prevalent on the 'notable' monuments and increased over time in the whole sample as transport and production costs were relatively lower as technology improved. As well as using more imported materials, the 'notable' monuments were also usually more complex, with a greater number of materials used.

The gravestones at Père Lachaise tend to be highly decorative, especially for the 'notable' dead where nearly half had four decorative motifs. There was an indication that levels of decoration may have gradually decreased over time, but still remained higher for notable individuals. Classical symbolism, particularly symbols of mortality such as wreaths, urns, winged hourglasses and inverted torches were popular motifs in all parts of the sample but were particularly common for the 'notable' dead, perhaps tying into the preference for classical style monuments. Religious motifs, mainly crosses, were very common despite the officially secular nature of French cemeteries, but the 'notable' monuments have a smaller proportion of religious motifs, suggesting that perhaps that those with agency over monuments for public figures might not choose to emphasise their religious beliefs in death. Commemoration of the profession or achievements of the deceased, or the inclusion of their likeness in the form of a portrait, bust or sculpture were both much more common for the notable graves than those surrounding them, showing once again a deliberate aim to differentiate them from other monuments.

Epitaphs on funerary monuments are often quite formulaic, and Père Lachaise is no exception. The most common introductory inscription in the sample is 'Famille' which appears on a large number of the family graves, leaving the viewer in no doubt about the importance of collective family identity in death. The other common phrasing was 'ici repose' with connotations of rest and sleep. Euphemisms for death e.g. 'dormir' are rare in the Père Lachaise sample, but the more gentle 'décédé' is much more common than starker 'mort' and 'mourir'. It was rare to record family relationships in the sample, but those which did occur were nearly all for women, usually identified as wife or widow. Among the other biographical information included, maiden names were also common, along with places of birth and death. It was rare for place of residence to be recorded, but titles and professions were more common, especially for the 'notable' dead. Longer epitaphs mainly fell into 3 common categories, sentimental epitaphs, religious ones and those which celebrated personal achievements. For the notable dead the latter was the most widely used.

9.2.5 Monumentality at Highgate Cemetery

The condition of the monuments and the inscriptions at Highgate were frequently affected by the overgrowth of vegetation since the 1970s, causing both structural damage and obscuring lettering. There is a preservation bias for graves along main pathways and those of public figures as the limited funding for restoration has been focused in these areas, especially on the socially active memorials. The absence of visible memorials on over 30% of the plots chosen for the random sample, shows that it is likely that the overall condition of graves at Highgate is much worse than the total sample, which is heavily skewed towards areas which have undergone restoration, might otherwise suggest.

There is a preference for Classical monuments in the Highgate sample, which is more strongly noted in the 'notable' monuments sample than those surrounding them. Gothic is the second most common style but is less often chosen for the 'notable' graves. Most of the Egyptian graves in the sample were obelisks or Egyptian revival catacombs in the Avenue and Circle. The Classical revival which had started in the 18th century, continued into the 19th century as the British like to see themselves as the successors of Roman empire and Greek democracy. Egyptian styles were initially popular in cemeteries due to their association with tombs in the public mind. The Gothic Revival was a reaction against these 'pagan' influences, but they remained popular for non-conformists and freethinkers, perhaps the reason for their choice for some of the 'notables' in the sample. There were also a small number of other styles present, particularly Celtic crosses and Art Nouveau styles.

The most common monument form in the total sample was headstones, which would be expected for British cemeteries, but for notable graves pedestal tombs are the most common form. There are few mausolea, but those which do exist are relatively large, and catacombs offer another elite burial option. The 'notable' graves are on average taller and larger than the others in the sample and a higher proportion have monuments or additional elements which cover the entire grave plot.

In London, the lack of locally available stone encouraged use of materials like marble and granite which would otherwise be significantly more expensive than local stone. Despite this, the 'notable' sample monuments still have a slightly higher use of these materials and they were also more likely to be complex including two or more different materials. Copper alloy was rare in the entire sample and not used for sculptures.

The monuments were in general less highly decorated than at Père Lachaise, but the 'notable' graves were slightly more decorated than the rest of the sample. The most common motifs, in all parts of the sample were religious motifs, particularly crosses. About 20% of the motifs across the sample were mortality symbols, usually drawn from classical symbolism especially urns and wreaths. Floral symbolism was also common. Depictions of the deceased were rare, but almost entirely absent outside the 'notable' monuments. Motifs commemorating profession were also rare outside of these graves.

Inscriptions often followed fairly conventional formulas, with a majority of first inscriptions starting with a reference to memory or remembrance, often combined with a sentimental term such as 'loving' or 'affectionate', it was usual to inscribe 'also of' before any subsequent names on the stone. The majority of inscriptions say 'died' but other euphemisms for death came in and out of fashion, such as 'departed this life' and 'fell asleep in Jesus' which were both only common in the 19th century, and 'Entered into rest' which appeared from the 1870s onwards when there was a greater emphasis on the importance of peaceful deaths. Over half of the inscriptions included a family relationship, but it was twice as common to include them for women as for men, usually listed as wife but inscriptions for daughters were also frequent. Between 12% and 14% of the total sample had some additional information about the people commemorated, such as their address, place of death, place of birth or profession and titles. A much higher proportion of the 'notable' people have inscriptions which contain this information, especially profession and titles. Longer epitaphs were twice as likely to be religious than sentimental, other kinds of longer epitaphs were rare.

9.2.6 Comparative monumental analysis

The monuments to the 'notable' dead shared many similarities between the two cemeteries, with their monuments being larger, taller, more complex and using more expensive materials. They are more likely than the graves of those around them to include motifs and inscriptions relating to their professional and personal achievements, although these accounts were often more extensive in Père Lachaise. Family connections for the notable dead tended to be downplayed at Highgate in favour of this information, whereas at Père Lachaise it was religious beliefs which were underrepresented.

In both cemeteries we see a shared repertoire of symbols from the same Western European cultural tradition, but the graves are less highly decorated at Highgate and are noticeably poorer in sculptural elements.

There were several other differences between the wider samples. In Père Lachaise it was common to inscribe the grave with 'Famille' but at Highgate family relationships tended to be precisely listed instead, which was rare at Père Lachaise, especially for men. At Highgate it was more common to share religious sentiments, not unexpected given the differences in wider religious observance in the two countries at the time, although crosses are the single most popular symbol in both. Sentimental inscriptions celebrating familial and romantic love are also common, showing that for the majority of graves it was ordinary family life and values, plus any hopes for an afterlife, which were the most important to commemorate.

9.3 Wider implications of research findings

The findings of this thesis suggest that there are marked differences between the way figures with a public profile are memorialised in comparison to others of a similar social class during the period of study. This suggests that their funerals and the monuments raised afterwards were significant in deciding how their identity would be portrayed in death and that their graves acted as sites of memory, used to help keep their legacy in the minds of the public. Their monuments remained socially active for longer than others within the cemetery which would likely to be of only generalised significance within a few years of erection unless reused for subsequent internments, leading to a preservation bias as these monuments to the 'notable' dead were better maintained. In France this was related to the 'cult of great men' but it seems that Victorian London also valued the role models offered by the departed great and good. In both cemeteries, the overall popularity of the cemetery as a place of burial was improved by the perception that it was an elite and exclusive final address, and that in some specific instances the grave of an individual would draw others to be buried close by. This is more common at Père Lachaise than at Highgate, and the French examples also show specific instances where monument styles were also copied. When studying the elite of the period and their influence on wider fashions, attitudes and behaviours, funerary practices should be considered as a key topic.

Landscape analysis of garden cemeteries and other 19th century landscapes is still relatively underutilised, but this research shows the value in applying these methods to landscapes of this period. Gravestones, despite their wealth of information, have also not been well studied, particularly 19th century monuments in comparison to earlier church and churchyard monuments and so there are a variety of areas with opportunities for further study, especially in France.

9.4 Further Research Opportunities

This thesis opens up new avenues for further research, as there are a number of ways in which the approaches used can become a foundation for additional cemetery studies.

One possibility for further research is expanding the analysis to other sites to see if the patterns identified at Père Lachaise and Highgate can also be detected in other regions and cemeteries. Interesting comparisons might be made with Glasgow Necropolis, Glasnevin Cemetery Dublin or Cathays in Cardiff, all of which were important cemeteries in their region and were described either as being like Père Lachaise, or given similar prominence in their region, when they opened.

Another possibility is broadening the analysis to more graves from Père Lachaise and Highgate to make a more comprehensive comparison of significant dead to 'background' data in cemeteries. The random samples in this thesis were a good way to explore a wide snapshot of both cemeteries in limited time, gathering an overall impression, for example of condition, materials and monument types, but their small size of made them statistically insignificant and useful for illustrative purposes only.

It was beyond the scope of this thesis, but some cemeteries have now had comprehensive recording done on a large scale, which might provide data for this kind of analysis. These datasets include all the memorials or a very large percentage of them.

The earliest example of using a computer database for storing memorial records for a whole cemetery is the Protestant Cemetery in Rome (Rahtz 1986) but this remained largely alone among European studies until more recently. The Mount Saint Lawrence Cemetery Project (2014) in Limerick, mapped and photographed all of the monuments, plus 2/3 of the inscriptions have been transcribed. The database can be searched by name or burial number, and the results can be displayed on a google map via the website, as well as individual record pages for each memorial. The project was very time consuming and involved the work of over 400 volunteers in addition to the research team. The database, although it does allow mapping by date and is impressive for genealogical purposes contains little information about the monuments and so would be limited it its application for research of the kind carried out in this thesis.

In Luxembourg, Streb et al. (2019) used a digital data collection tool called the Cemetery Surveyor Application to 'compile a set of data encompassing all the material aspects of each grave in a cemetery in Luxembourg' (2019, 334). They used GIS to map microgeographies of Walferdange Cemetery, differences in materiality between individual graves and different sections of the cemetery, as well as building overall chronological of different styles and forms (2019, 337). They were therefore able to show that not only did wider fashions and mentalities affect the 'material agency' of those choosing designs for their own loved ones, but there was also a correlation with the existing monuments in that area of the cemetery (2019, 339). Their recording data included dimensions, grave type, design, materials and inscription, for a total of 114 variables, and created a typology which was specific to the cemetery. They extracted both chronological and spatial data, for example the below map (figure 140) which is a 'heat map' showing the spatial distribution of one gravestone type, which shows a strong degree of spatial clustering, as loved one imitate a style they have seen nearby and liked when choosing a memorial themselves.

Although the technology used for their analysis was specifically designed for the University of Luxembourg, there are now commercial systems which might offer the customisability to conduct large scale studies like this more easily. One system, developed by Atlantic Geomatics, is currently being used to digitally map many burial grounds. It is designed primarily to be used for burial ground management, linking photos of memorials and transcripts of inscriptions to burial records. In 2021 the company was commissioned to survey and map all Church of England churchyards. The advantage of this system is that the digital map of the whole cemetery can be quickly generated using backpack mounted technology, so that one operative walking through the site can record large areas in a single day with a high degree of spatial precision and that it can be customised to include additional fields which are of interest. For example, the Celebrating Birmingham's Burial Grounds Project by Caring for God's Acre (2022) has included a typology of different monument types and a condition check field in their data entry, which allow the database to be searched not only by name or date but also queries such as 'all obelisks' or 'all graves in poor condition'. Populating the map with data can still be extremely time consuming –CfGA volunteers who photograph and record the gravestones can usually record around 10 gravestones per hour depending on complexity and experience. This presents few issues for smaller churchyards but makes large cemeteries more challenging. Warstone Lane Cemetery in Birmingham which opened in 1848, is a relatively small cemetery in comparison to later municipal cemeteries, containing just over 90,000 burials and far fewer monuments (approx. 4000), is still not fully recorded after 2 years of consistent work. Figure 141 shows an extract from a completed section of the map, each grave is clickable leading to the database entry and once completed and published it will be fully searchable.

Atlantic Geomatics have recently been working on mapping and photographing all 53,000 graves Highgate Cemetery and linking their records to the existing digital burial register with records of 170,000 people (Atlantic Geomatics 2021). The company are also undertaking all of the monument photography and photo matching. Once completed, this digital map would be a useful starting point for further study, particularly if permission was given to introduce custom fields to enrich the data, creating something closer to the Streb et al. project in Luxembourg. Where rich datasets like these are created, exploration of themes which have rarely been seen in cemetery studies would become relatively straightforward e.g. spatial change over time and comparisons between different denominations within a particular burial ground (both suggested as gaps by Mytum 2004a, 119 and 139) would be much more straightforward.

9.5 Final Summary

This thesis represents a narrow but deep dive into the landscape of two iconic cemeteries: Père Lachaise and Highgate, revealing the complexity of development in both cases, the ways in which Père Lachaise inspired Highgate and the ways in which their landscapes diverged over time, due partly to changing attitudes and also management practices. Both cemeteries were designed as ceremonial spaces where funerals would take place, but also as places of leisure and education. Originally sharing a vision of death as an Elysian fields or Acadian Idyll, today Père Lachaise is a city of the dead with neat tree lined streets between the tombs and mausolea which represent the eternal homes of each family, while Highgate is an urban woodland where nature dominates. Although both began life as open gardens with scattered tombs and planting, the transition to exclusive use for perpetual concessions at Père Lachaise filled the cemetery with stones until it began to mirror the city below, and like Haussmann's Paris became a site where French identity and national memory were negotiated and maintained. At Highgate the beauty of nature was still prized for its comfort to the bereaved throughout the late Victorian and Edwardian periods and so many of the graves still included planting of shrubs and flowers or between them. The regularly maintenance and replacement of stones associated with grave reuse at Père Lachaise continued throughout the 20th century and up to the present day, ensured by successive French governments. At Highgate, the financial collapse of the joint stock company responsible for its care led to a period of neglect where nature tried to fully reclaim the cemetery, before the Friends of Highgate Cemetery began to redress the balance. Throughout all the changes though, both cemeteries have continued to act as spaces for ritual (both public funerals and private grave tending) and draw visitors to stroll among the tombs.

The majority of the gravestones in this study, and the cemeteries more widely, tell ordinary family stories about love, loss, hope and grief, mostly through the monuments erected by the emerging middle classes. For those whom the opportunities of the industrial revolution had brought increased disposable income, there came the ability to purchase a family plot. This was then used to create a private space for mourning and remembrance, whilst in good company in the community of the dead, celebrating the virtues which make their members worthy of inclusion. Within each landscape there was also a small group of elite figures with a public profile, which were the focus of the 'notable' graves sample, whose monuments showed different motivations. For many of these monuments the private functions of grief and individual memory became secondary to the public functions of the memorial as a site for creating and perpetuating the collective memory of the deceased, through highly visible and individualised monuments.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE GARDEN CEMETERY
- Volume 2
Appendix 1—Appendix form key

The memorial recording form and the codes used to abbreviate characteristics are adapted from Mytum's 2000 book – Recording and Analysing Graveyards. This system uses coding to allow precise typologies to be recorded and tailored to the burial ground which is being recorded.

Physical dimensions

Location—longitude and latitude of primary grave in each set (.1) taken whilst standing in the bottom left corner of the plot, using a handheld GPS unit with an accuracy of approx. 10m (commercially available unit, purchased in 2012), although this was likely to be affected in some locations, especially at Highgate where there was heavy tree cover.

Orientation— orientation of the grave measured using a compass, to the nearest 5 degrees. Orientation measured outwards from the first/main inscription on the memorial.

Height— measured using a 2m folding ruler and correct to the nearest 1cm for heights less than 2m. Over 2m, height estimated from photographs (length of folding ruler in pixels divided by 200 = x height of memorial in pixels divided by x = height in cm and rounded to the nearest 5cm.

Width (monument/additional elements)— width of the main monument e.g. headstone, tomb etc. and width of entire memorial including additional elements e.g. railings, kerbs etc. Measured using tape measure and/or 2m folding ruler and correct to 1cm at Highgate (unless memorial declared unsafe). At Pere Lachaise, fieldwork restrictions meant that some measurements had to be calculated from photos using the technique above for heights, accurate to nearest 5cm. Width is the measurement of the side of the memorial which has the first/main inscription.

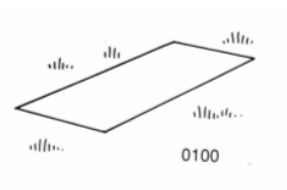

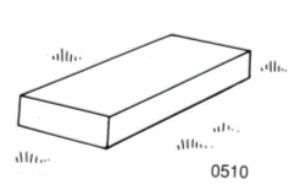

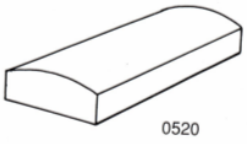

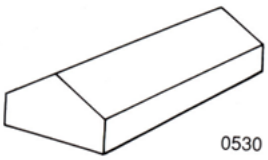

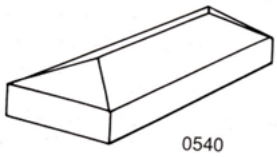

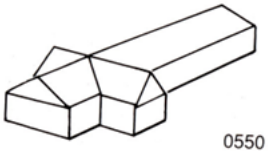

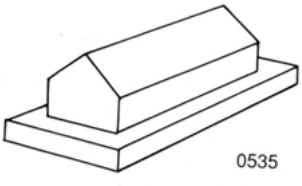

Thickness/Length (monument/additional elements)— length of the main monument e.g. headstone, tomb etc. and width of entire memorial including additional elements e.g. railings, kerbs etc. Measured using tape measure and/or 2m folding ruler and correct to 1cm at Highgate (unless memorial declared unsafe). At Pere Lachaise, fieldwork restrictions meant that some measurements had to be calculated from photos using the technique above for heights, accurate to nearest 5cm. Length is the other dimension once width has been decided.

Appendix 2— Père Lachaise Records

These records are the result of recording which took place in January 2016 and contain some references to recording done in August 2010.

Additional photographs can be viewed on Google Drive at: https://drive.google.com/drive/folders/1T-qQiFRRHp14R4PcLBx0zO1wWkh3qG5r?usp=drive_link

The sample is organised as follows:

PLC1-PLC25—is the 'notable' graves sample. The 'notable graves' are .1 and the surrounding graves which begin at .2 with the grave to the left of the notable grave and continue clockwise until all the graves in the immediate area have been captured.

PLC26-PLC50—is the random sample. These graves were chosen using a random number generator to choose the division, row and plot. They are recorded in isolation rather than with their surrounding context.

PIERRE ABAILARD FONDATEUR DE CETTE ABBAYE VIVOIT DANS LE DOUZIEME SIECLE, IL
SE DISTIGUA PAR LA PROFONDEUR DE SON SÇAVOIR ET PAR LA RARETÉ DE SON MÉRITE
CEPANDANT IL PUBLIA UN TRAITÉ DE LA TRINITÉ QUI FUT CONDAMNÉ PAR UN CONCILE
TENU À SOISSONS EN 1120. IL SE RÉTRACTA AUSSITÔT PAR UNE SOUMISSION PARFAITE ET POUR TÉMOIGNER QU'IL N'AVOIT QUE DES SENTIMENS ORTHODOXES IL FIT FAIRE DE CETTE
SEULE PIERRE CES TROIS FIGURES QUI REPRÉSENTENT LES TROIS PERSONNES DIVINES
DANS UNE NATURE, APRÈS AVOIR CONSACRÉ CETTE ÉGLISE AU SAINT ESPIRIT QU'IL NOMMA
PARACLET PAR RAPPORT AUX CONSOLATIONS QU'IL AVOIT GOUTÉES PENDANT LA RETRAITE
QU'IL FIT EN CE LIEU. IL AVOIT ÉPOUSE HÉLOYSE QUI EN FUT LA PREMIÈRE ABBESSE
L'AMOUR QUI AVOIT UNI LEURS ESPIRITS DURANT LEUR VIE ET QUI SE CONSERVA PENDANT LEUR ABSENCE PAR DES LETTRES LES PLUS TENDRES ET LES PLUS SPIRITUELLES A RÉUNI
AVOIR DONNÉ L'UN ET L'AUTRE DES MARQUES D'UNE VIE CHRÉTIENNE ET SPIRTUELLE

Appendix 3— Highgate Records

These records are the result of recording which took place between May 2012 and February 2022.

Additional photographs can be viewed on Google Drive at: https://drive.google.com/drive/folders/1EsMFNIFwsI_m93IyJMkTR7C7Tq1NLVek?usp=drive_link

The sample is organised as follows:

HGW1-HGW57—is the 'notable' graves sample for Highgate West Cemetery. The 'notable graves' are .1 and the surrounding graves which begin at .2 with the grave to the left of the notable grave and continue clockwise until all the graves in the immediate area have been captured.

HGE1-HGE14—is the 'notable' graves sample for Highgate East Cemetery. It follows the same numbering system as above.

HGR1-HGR25—is the random sample. These graves were chosen using a random number generator to choose the map book page, row and plot. They are recorded in isolation rather than with their surrounding context.

Beloved Mother and Grandmother
Founder of Hampstead Hill School in 1949
Lover of poetry, music and all earth's beauty

in December 2001
to join her dearest daughter Vanessa who departed this earth in January 2000

Deeply missed by her family, whose love is with her eternally

When up to the hill tops of beauty and light
My soul like a lark in the ether takes flight
And the white gates of heaven shine brighter and nearer
The song of the spirit grows sweeter and clearer
Up, up to the realms where no mortal has trod
Into space and infinity near to my god
With whiteness and silence and beautiful things
I am borne when the voice of eternity sings

Appendix 4 – Comparative Analysis

Appendix 4.1 Introduction

This appendix aims to draw together all the data discussed thus far, gathered at both Père Lachaise and Highgate cemeteries to perform a comparative analysis of how the landscape and monumentality developin both cemeteries during the period from their inception until 1914. These two cemeteries will also be compared to the wider context in Northwest Europe during the same timeframe. Firstly, the landscapes and their development will be considered, drawing upon the themes laid out in Chapters four and five. Then a comparative analysis of the monumentality with be undertaken based on the factors discussed in Chapters six and seven. In both cases, the burials of, and monuments to the significant or 'notable' dead and the wider impacts which these have, will be an especial focus.

Appendix 4.2 Landscape

Firstly, the wider context for cemetery development in both countries will be compared before turning to a specific comparison of the landscapes in both case study cemeteries. There are many similarities between the landscapes of Highgate and Père Lachaise, and it is certain that this is not accidental. As we have already discussed Etlin stated that 'it became impossible to fashion a cemetery which was not in some way analogous' (1984, ix) to Père Lachaise, and certainly there is strong evidence that building their own version of Père Lachaise was a motivation for many early British cemetery advocates such as John Strang in Glasgow (1831) and George Frederick Carden in his plans for London which were realised at Kensal Green (Curl 2000, 44). Although it has been suggested that other landscapes may have had as great or greater influence on British cemetery design, this thesis finds that the Père Lachaise model cannot be ignored, at least at Highgate Cemetery.

Appendix 4.2.1 Cemetery design in France and Britain 1800 – 1914

One early influence on British and other European burial practices were colonial cemeteries in India, such as South Park Street Cemetery in Calcutta where many British Colonial administrators, soldiers and businessmen are buried in tombs which combine European and Indian architectural influences (Curl 2000, Worpole 2003). Cemeteries were formed out of necessity as there were no churches or churchyards there for burial in the 17th and 18th centuries. It seems that the influence is mostly on the fashion for large tombs and mausoleums, rather than any specific designs for cemetery landscapes, as the sites tend to be relatively small with few landscape features. Both South Park Street Calcutta and Surat cemeteries are roughly rectangular with straight or grid plan pathways. It has been argued that the grand tombs began as a way to demonstrate wealth and power in a country where the political elite were known for their lavish mausoleums, and that this practice is what influenced the inclusion of family mausoleums on country estates in Britain (Curl 2000, 30).

Père Lachaise, and other early French cemeteries, were inspired by these English Landscape gardens with their scattered tombs, mausoleums, and cenotaphs, as was discussed in chapter 4. The English Landscape Garden was clearly a handy model for British cemeteries too, once the example of Père Lachaise became known. Elliott argues that these gardens were used as a direct inspiration more than Père Lachaise itself wondering 'how many of the British campaigners who cited its example had actually visited it.' (Elliott 2001, 288). It has also been suggested that another favourite of the Romantics; 'Sublime landscapes' had more influence than landscape gardens on the earliest British Cemeteries (Elliott 2019). The sublime relied on the relationships between humans and grand or terrifying aspects of nature such as mountains (Shaw 2014). This may explain the choice of rugged landscapesfor some early cemeteries such as the rocky and infertile Fir Park for Glasgow Necropolis (1831) andSt James Liverpool (1829) which was constructed in a former quarry (Elliott 2019), however these examples remain rare.

Elliott has also suggested that the 'semi-formal park style' innovated at Regent's Park from 1811 may have been an influence on British Cemetery design (2001, 2019), and the circular carriage drive and grand avenues in Regents Park were a closer to home source of inspiration for these features. Elliott also suggests that parks continued to inspire later cemetery designs with Crystal Palace Park in 1852 encouraging popularity of 'butterfly plans' with symmetrical elements off a central avenue, and then Alexandra Palace (first opened 1873) encouraging less formal designs in the last quarter of the century in cemeteries too (Elliott 2019). It would be naïve to suggest that there wasn't a dialogue between cemetery and park design, especially with a number of designers working on both, including Joseph Paxton who designed Crystal Palace and also London Road Cemetery in Coventry (Historic Coventry Trust 2022). However, there generally remained a clear separation between the two, with many features which were relatively common in public parks such as water features and large herbaceous flowerbeds remaining rare in cemetery designs. The single designer who had the biggest influence on British Cemeteries was John Claudius Loudon, who advocated for cemeteries tohave their own clear style which could not be mistaken for public parks.

Loudon had written articles about cemetery design throughout the 1830s and 40s and collated them into his book 'On the laying out, planting and management of cemeteries' in 1843 which gave detailed recommendations on all aspects of cemetery management from choosing a site to arranging drainage and sinking graves (Curl 2000, 121). His preference was for cemeteries to be laid out on a grid plan with a 'utilitarian and hygienic approach' (Curl 2000, 129) and for them to be sparsely planted with trees, primarily evergreens. He was directly involved with the designs for threecemeteries, only one of which, Histon Road in Cambridge was executed largely as he intended (Curl 2000, 128), but his influence was much wider, with every major town or city having a Loudon-style cemetery (Elliott 2019).

In Paris this desire for hygienic and dignified burial had always been crucial to the choice of cemetery location and design, as an antidote to the horrors seen at Les Innocents and other overcrowded churchyards within the city limits (Etlin 1984). In the early days of the cemetery movement in Britain religious freedom was more important than hygiene concerns (despite similar issues from overcrowding) and so these concerns didn't come to the forefront of British cemetery discourse until the 1830s and 40s. Hygienic management of the dead on the continent remained several decades ahead of British practice, influencing not only Loudon but also both Walker (1839) and Chadwick (1843) who referenced it in their reports. The General Board of Health even made a visit to Paris in 1850 to investigate the effectiveness of their cemetery management systems (Rugg 2020, 82).

However, Pére Lachaise was not the only available model for a modern cemetery, and by the 1830s and 1840s when garden cemeteries were proliferating, their designers were certainly aware of other approaches. In 1836 the Directors of Kensal Green compared the extent and variety of the cemetery to Frankfurt and Paris, but with the secluded enclosures of Campi Santi at Bologna and Pisa (Curl 2001c, 98). And by the 1840s Germany was being looked to as the example for good practice in cemetery management (Curl 2001d, 121-122), for example Hamptfriedhof in Frankfurt-Am-Main was greatly admired as what a modern cemetery could be (Curl 2001b, 78) with the layout of the cemetery and grave plots at Munich was specifically praised by Loudon, in contrast to Père Lachaise where organisation was 'left to chance' (Curl 1984, 228).

Appendix 4.2.2 Landscape design at Père Lachaise and Highgate

In Chapter 4, it was shown that the key elements of the Père Lachaise landscape were; straight allées running parallel to the hilltop, winding pathways on the sloping areas of the site, rond-points at key intersections which were designed to be additional focal points, and wooded areas called bosquets for more secluded burials. Although some of these features existed in the landscape before the cemetery, it was Brongniart's design which really unified them into a single vision. In 1839 when the map in Figure 1 was drawn it appears that a second rond-point had not yet been completed, although plans for this feature had been included since the earliest designs for Père Lachaise. At thisstage, there was just a looping pathway and the second rond-point was added at the bottom of the loop later.

At first glance, the landscape at Highgate may not seem to share these characteristics, but when looking in detail at the early plans for the cemetery, they become more readily apparent. In fact, we can see instances where each of the above features is adapted for use at Highgate, as shown in Figure 2. Although some of proposed rond-points were eventually lost at Highgate, due to the practicalities of the terrain, the original intent is clear. In both cases, some of the features had been retained and adapted from the previous use of the site, such as the straight terrace and Cedar of Lebanon at Highgate, and the allée and bosquets at Père Lachaise.

In fact, the similarities begin even before the design of the landscapes, with the choice of site. In both cases the sites chosen were formally the gardens of country estates, with steeply sloping sites and afford a view of the city in the distance. Highgate more closely mirrors Père Lachaise than the early 'sublime' cemeteries such as Glasgow Necropolis. At Highgate the chosen site was less dramatic and rugged, still with a significant gradient but naturally undulating rather than divided by man-made terraces, therefore having a closer resemblance to Père Lachaise, and the 'garden cemetery' model which developed there.

This is also true of many of the other early London cemeteries, sometimes known as the 'Magnificent Seven' (Mellor and Parsons 2011). Brompton Cemetery is the exception in this group asit is utterly flat and is rigidly laid out with strong symmetry, relying on architectural features to create interest as the site had no topographic variation, although it does include a central circular feature (Historic England 1987a). However, all of the others combine a number of the elements fromthe Père Lachaise model including straight avenues, circular features and winding pathways, often on sloping hillside sites. This is especially true at Nunhead Cemetery, also run by the London Cemetery Company. Their second cemetery (opened 1840) was built on Nunhead Hill, with views over the city of London, landscaped to include a central avenue leading to the chapel, flanked by crescents, and with other pathways winding across the hillside (see figure 3). They had found a successful formula at Highgate and wanted to replicate it, even asking James Bunstone Bunning to lay out the grounds (Historic England 1987b).

The popularity of both Père Lachaise and Highgate cemeteries, along with the growing populations of both Paris and London have partially obscured the original layouts because there were later extensions in each case. At Highgate the effect of these is less pronounced because the New Ground is separated from the Old Ground by Swains' Lane, but in both cases the landscapes are less 'romantic' and more rigidly laid out. This corresponds to both to a desire to increase the amount of burial space available by using space in the most efficient way, and an evolving understanding of the way a hygienic cemetery should best be operated. Natural beauty continued to be valued in cemeteries as a source ofcomfort by bereaved British families, with accounts which mention this actually increasing from the 1880s (Jalland 1996, 222). Tarlow believes this was tied to 'Protestant values of simplicity and nature' which were central to British identity in the 19th century (2000a, 224), perhaps explaining why during the late Victorian and Edwardian period Highgate remained much closer to the original landscape design than Père Lachaise did.
America, like England 'retained the rural landscape idea, with fewer monumental tombs, but a preponderance of ordinary graves surmounted by simple memorials.' (Curl 1984, 227), but perhaps we cannot easily divide cemetery models purely on religious lines because Presbyterian Scotland and Ulster 'often favoured house-tombs on the French model' whilst predominantly Roman Catholic Ireland 'developed the English landscape tradition at Glasnevin' (Curl 1984, 228).

The landscapes of both Highgate and Père Lachaise reveal separations based on class and religious belief, although the methods of demarcation differ. At Père Lachaise the public graves, before they were abolished, were grouped together in a single area of the cemetery, on the lower plain, an area which therefore contained no permanent memorials and would have been largely overlooked by visitors without a personal connection to those buried there. At Highgate, the common graves were even more invisible – unmarked and spread throughout the cemetery, but often in double rows so that the spaces they occupied, which would remain free from grave markers, could be grassed over to form pathways. The biggest difference between the two cemeteries in this regard is that until Père Lachaise was designated as an exclusively elite cemetery, every Parisian had the right to burial there, free of charge, albeit for a short duration of occupancy in the grave. At Highgate, owned by a private company, the right to burial there was always restricted to those with sufficient income.

The religious divide at Highgate is a relatively subtle one, using trees to delineate the unconsecrated ground in the West Cemetery for non-conformist burials, whereas before religious separation was abolished in French cemeteries, both the Jewish and Muslim cemeteries at Père Lachaise were walled areas.

Grave orientation in both cemeteries shares a common feature, with graves generally not following the strict E-W orientation which had been favoured for Christian burial in the past but instead laid out primarily with respect to the pathways and cemetery boundaries. This would have been practicalfor marking out plots but also aided visitors with finding and viewing the memorials. An effort had been made in both cities to frame views of the city behind the monuments so that a visual link between the two could be drawn by the visitor (as demonstrated in Figures 4 and 5). Jalland states that 'bereaved families often chose burial-plots in places of beauty, sometimes even with views, as if these mattered to the souls sleeping below' (Jalland 1996, 215).

Just as we saw groupings of 'kindred spirits' at Père Lachaise in several areas of the cemetery, there are also key examples of this at Highgate, particularly in the New Ground (East Cemetery) in the unconsecrated section around the grave of George Elliot and on White Eagle Hill where Polish exiles were buried together. However, overall, there are fewer examples of people being buried close to those from a similar profession or background at Highgate compared to Père Lachaise. There is, however, a strong concentration of the notable dead in relatively small areas of the cemetery – especially along the main pathways and the upper part of the cemetery around the circle of Lebanon. This is consistent with similar clustering of notable dead at Père Lachaise. In both cases, the more expensive and more prominent locations were favoured.

At Père Lachaise the 1855 plan shows that grave plots were frequently sold in order along rows, andwe also have evidence of areas at Highgate where most of the graves are close together in date. It isthus apparent that in both cemeteries the authorities exercised a degree of control over which plotswere available to purchase at a given time. However, this is where the similarities of grave management end. The most fundamental difference between Père Lachaise and Highgate, and in fact French and British cemetery management, is that grave re-use was not practiced at Highgate.

Therefore, where we see newer graves dotted around at Père Lachaise because of the clearance andresale of plots, we see a different pattern at Highgate. In some cases, there are newer graves squeezed into rows to fill previously empty spaces, but most of the new graves are in areas where originally there was no intention for burials to take place. Good examples of this are the circular carriage drive in the West Cemetery which was narrowed in the 20th century to add another row of graves, or the area along the main path from the entrance to the East Cemetery where ashes plots have been created since the avenue of Poplars had to be felled. This means that at Highgate, late 20th and 21st century graves are much lower in number than at Père Lachaise where more plots are available for reuse, clustered into just a few areas within the landscape.

In addition to the effect on the choice of grave location, at Père Lachaise we also saw some examples where graves were orientated to face the notable dead. There are no examples of this at Highgate, because unlike at Père Lachaise where the interior of some of the older sections saw less strict observance of rows, at Highgate cemetery the use of rows for plots was more strongly enforced throughout all areas. Overall, although there were almost certainly other influences on the landscape design of British cemeteries, at Highgate cemetery at least, the importance of Père Lachaise as a model should not beminimised.

Appendix 4.3 Monumentality

As well as the similarities in landscape noted above, the monumentality at Père Lachaise and Highgate, and Britain and France more widely, also show many commonalities. This is due to a shared language of symbolism, monumental form and architectural styles across Western Europe. However, there are also significant differences between the monumentality of the two cemeteries as will be shown below. This chapter will also investigate how the factors which affect monumentality chosen for the graves of significant individuals may differ between the cemeteries and explore the wider effects of these monuments.

Appendix 4.3.1 Typical monumentality in France and Britain 1800 – 1914

To begin, this chapter will look at the broad patterns of monumentality in Britain and France during the period discussed by this thesis. The monumentality of both places is influenced by a variety of social factors including attitudes to death and religious belief, as well as style movements in architecture. Symbolism is also largely a shared language across Western Europe during the 19th century.

One of the largest changes to the symbolism around death which occurred during the late 18th and early 19th centuries in both Britain and France was caused by a change in attitudes to death. The morbid symbolism which had held sway from the medieval period on church monuments and in art became increasingly unpopular by the 18th century, perhaps because the real horrors of death were becoming all too familiar to those visiting overcrowded urban churchyards. Instead 'romanticised' symbolism of death with cherubs instead of skulls and other symbolism based on a classical repertoire and natural forms developed and was then given full expression in the garden cemetery (Mytum 2000, 29-35).

There are also many similarities in both architectural style and form between the two regions, due to shared stylistic influences. Britain, France as well as other countries had Neoclassical revivals as the architecture and culture of Classical civilisations were used for inspiration, with Western Europeans seeing themselves as the natural successors of the Greek and Roman world. Gothic styles were also popular in both France and Britain due to a common Christian history which had strongly influenced monumentality for many centuries. In fact, all the basic memorial forms; ledger slabs, chest tombs, pedestal tombs, headstones and mausolea were adapted from the forms of existing church and churchyard monuments (Mytum 2000). Architectural styles which developed later in the studied period, also show similarities between the two regions, such as Art Nouveau, which although first used in French monuments, then spread to Britain. There are however some key differences between France and Britain at this time which are expressed in the monumentality which is generally found during the period 1800-1914.

One key difference is that in France during this period there was a very different form of governance and relationship with religion, due to the French revolution and the separation of church and state. Although there were several regime changes in France during the period 1800-1914, there was oftena strong anti-clerical sentiment. Therefore, although many people continued to believe in the Catholic traditions which had shaped the lives of their forefathers, some were also changed and incorporated into the secular cult of great men which flourished in post-revolutionary France.

In Britain, the political and religious background had significant differences. Britain was becoming increasingly tolerant of a wider variety of religious beliefs, accommodated through cemetery chapels and commemorated on individual monuments. Not only was Britain a Protestant country, but there was also a strong tradition of dissenting Christianity, with non-conformists tending to adopt Classically influenced styles both for their places of worship and for the monuments. Partly in response to this, there was also a resurgence in Anglican Christianity, with key figures like Pugin calling for an end to the use of pagan influences and a return to Gothic styles, which mean that by the end of the 19th century many decorative elements which had been shunned since the reformation as 'papish' had seen a revival in Anglican memorials. The context surrounding agnostic and secular movements was also different in Britain, although their monuments are not often readily distinguished stylistically from those of dissenters. There was also a growing artistic expression of national identity, particularly in Ireland during the late 19th century, which can also beseen in English cemeteries where monuments were erected to citizens of these countries or their descendants, for example through the use of Celtic crosses for grave markers.

There are also some minor stylistic differences; for example, the Neoclassical repertoire in France generally treated Egyptian elements as interchangeable with Greek and Roman ones, whereas in Britain we see a short-lived fashion for explicitly Egyptian cemetery buildings before the style is integrated into the wider classical repertoire, with monuments largely in the form of obelisks which become a common monument type. There were also some local style movements such as the British Arts and Crafts movement, and then Art Nouveau in France which experienced some delay in expression on opposite sides of the channel.

Appendix 4.3.2 The Monumentality of the sample graves

The monumentality of the sample graves will be compared using several broad categories; condition, style and form, materials, symbols and inscriptions before considering the overall effect created. Monumentality reveals some interesting trends when compared in more detail between the two cemeteries, although a direct and fair comparison is not easy. For example, we must be mindful that the sample at Père Lachaise is the smaller sample. However, given the type of analysis taken here, the effect of this is negligible because the samples make no attempt at being representative of the cemetery they are located within, they are instead a detailed look at a specific set of practices for an elite group.

Condition

Although the condition of the inscriptions is not hugely noticeable different between Père Lachaise where 29% have suffered some damage and Highgate where 33% have deteriorated in some way (with most of the difference being attributable to obstruction by vegetation) there is a marked difference in the condition of the monuments themselves.

The policy at Père Lachaise of re-using any grave which is no longer receiving sufficient maintenance means that the overall condition of the monuments is higher, although many have weathered details and inscriptions. The monuments which were in worst condition have been periodically lost from the landscape and replaced by new ones and so are absent from the sample. This policy of re-use does encourage maintenance of all graves by their owners, but it also creates preservation bias, because for graves where there is still wider public interest there is more likely to be willingness and means to pay for the work required.

At Highgate, there is no re-use of graves, except unused graves and a much less consistent history of maintenance because the joint-stock cemeteries relied on the sale of new graves to pay for maintenance of the landscape which also affected individual monuments because in the 20th century, as these cemeteries became full and eventually went bankrupt, nature was allowed to run unchecked in many cemeteries. Highgate was a relatively extreme example of this, becoming wildly overgrown in the post-war period, with many self-seeded trees and a blanket of ivy spreading acrossthe monuments. This means that the condition is much more variable than at Père Lachaise. Even assessing condition presents a challenge in some cases where the undergrowth is still unchecked. For understandable financial and nature conservation reasons the recent restoration efforts have been focused on relatively small areas of the cemetery – primarily along the main pathways in the West for safety reasons and to improve the tour experience. However, this programme of repairs is ongoing, and suffers from similar bias to the maintenance at Père Lachaise, in that public interest often dictates where limited funding will be directed. The random sample, where 8 of the 25 graves had no surviving trace of a monument, indicates that on a cemetery scale this is a significant problem and is likely underestimated by the notable graves and surrounding graves sample as thesegraves are often clustered in the areas which have undergone more restoration and suffered less from unchecked vegetation.

This preservation bias is confirmed in both cemeteries because the condition of both the monument and inscription was highest for the 'notable' graves which attract public attention, compared those which surround them. However, the surrounding graves, in more prestigious locations, were inbetter condition than random sample graves of a similar date.

Style and Form

As discussed above there are several broad style movements which influence monumentality in France and England during the period 1800-1914, many of which can be seen in both countries, but with some differences. The graphs below (Figure 6 and 7) show the relative popularity of each style at Père Lachaise and Highgate cemetery in the total samples. Although these samples are small,and by their very nature unlikely to be totally representative of the range of monumentality within these cemeteries, we have seen that in Chapters 6 and 7, they do broadly fit with the wider trends reported elsewhere in the literature for their respective countries.

As you can see, although Classical is the most popular style in both cemeteries, there are some significant differences. The first difference is that at Highgate, due to the condition issues mentioned above, there are a larger number of memorials of unknown style. However, it is the increased prevalence of gothic memorials at Highgate which makes the biggest difference, which is in line with what would be expected due to the strength of the Gothic revival in England, and the comparative freedom with which people there expressed their Christian beliefs through monument style.

Highgate also has more Celtic monuments, perhaps due to the Irish influence, and more Egyptian monuments, primarily because of the Egyptian style catacombs in the Circle of Lebanon and Egyptian Avenue. There are also a number of 'Rustic' style graves inspired by the Arts and Crafts movement at Highgate, but none of these were present in the Père Lachaise sample. However, the Highgate sample has no Chinese inspired memorials (which at Père Lachaise are a new 21st century addition) and fewer modern memorials, probably due to the lack of grave reuse making the averagedate of the sample earlier. There are also differences in memorial form too, as shown in Table 1 and 2.

The largest difference being the popularity of mausolea at Père Lachaise, where there are many small mausolea which occupy a single plot. At Highgate, mausolea are relatively uncommon and those which do exist are larger. The average size of a mausoleum at Père Lachaise is 7.96sqm (or 4.47sqm with the Thiers mausoleum excluded) and at Highgate it is 16.24sqm (or 12.91sqm with the Beer Mausoleum excluded), showing that at Highgate this is not a memorial form typically chosen for a standard family plot, it is instead a large architectural statement by a small elite group. The Egyptian Avenue and Circle of Lebanon catacombs are also available at Highgate providing families with similar levels of privacy to the interior of a private mausoleum but at a lower cost than buildingtheir own, discouraging the construction of small mausolea at Highgate.

Conversely, headstones are a popular monument type at Highgate, being the most common monument form in the whole sample and second most popular choice for the 'notable' dead but are comparatively rare at Père Lachaise, reflecting a general preference for headstones as the default monument type in Britain which has continued into the 20th and 21st centuries, while the study at Père Lachaise indicates that low monuments may be the default form of choice for more recent French graves.

The use of pedestal tombs, especially for the 'notable' dead is popular in both cemeteries, although this is more pronounced at Père Lachaise where they are by far the most popular form. Reflecting in both cases the popularity of tall forms and sculptural elements, especially for public figures. Both cemeteries have a similar proportion of low monuments and chest tombs in their total samples, but crosses, which are rare at Père Lachaise make up nearly 15% of the gravestones in the Highgate sample. Crosses are a common motif in both cemeteries (as will be seen below), but the use of large stone crosses on roughly square bases (usually with 3 steps, chosen to represent the Holy Trinity) is rare in the French sample where instead these large crosses tend to appear on top oflow monuments or chest tombs, usually flat but sometimes upright.

Materials

There are some clear differences between Père Lachaise and Highgate in terms of the most common material type chosen for memorials which are due to the local geology of the regions. As stated in Chapter 6, Paris has a rich source of stone for the construction of memorials – a pale coloured limestone which is ideal for carving. In London, there is not a source of stone locally because the city is built on clay, and therefore the only building material which is available in the immediate area are yellow 'London bricks' and all stone is imported, most commonly from other parts of the UK.

Due to the additional cost of transporting the stone adding to the likely cost of all memorials, it was considered that there might be an overall tendency towards smaller memorials at Highgate, which cover a smaller percentage of the purchased plot. The seems to be the case as there was a smaller proportion of the graves which had additional elements to cover the whole grave plot at Highgate (65% of the total sample, 83% of the 'notable' graves) than at Père Lachaise (89% of the total sample, 92% of the 'notable' graves). At Père Lachaise, nearly every plot had a flat stone border or base even if there were no other additional elements, but at Highgate there were a significant proportion, especially away from the main pathways (where monuments tended to be on raised bases) which had only the main monument, usually a headstone. This is part of the reason that Highgate has retained more of a natural feel and become less of a 'city' of the dead over time, because at Père Lachaise nearly every plot is entirely covered with stone. Monuments are also on average, shorter in all categories at Highgate than Père Lachaise, probably due to the monument types chosen (headstones more popular, pedestal tombs and mausoleums less popular) but the cost of stone may have been a factor in these decisions. See table 3.

Total sample	219cm	164cm
Notable graves	299cm	221cm
Surrounding graves	213cm	158cm
Random sample	190cm	109cm

Although the samples in both cemeteries were too small to pick out any chronological patterns of material use over time, there were several differences in material choice between the cemeteries. As expected, the most commonly used material at Père Lachaise was the local limestone, with small proportions of imported stone, most commonly grey granite and pink marble (see Figure 8). At Highgate, although limestone is used relatively often, the most common stone is white marble, and there are also larger proportions of grey and especially pink granites used. As none of the stone is local, the difference in cost between a British limestone such as Portland stone and a Cornish or Scottish granite or even an Italian marble may have been smaller, encouraging use of marble for carving and granite for large structural elements. There was also a slightly broader range of materials used at Highgate, including the survival of some wooden crosses (see Figure 9).

In both cemeteries there is a clear difference between the 'notable' dead and the rest of the sample, in terms of the types and numbers of materials used. As table 4 shows in both cemeteries, the memorials for the 'notable' dead were more complex than the rest of the sample, using a greater number of different materials. However, the Père Lachaise sample contains greater complexity than the Highgate sample in all categories. This is partly explained by the prevalence of mausolea at Père Lachaise which usually have a limestone exterior, marble interior or panels and an iron door. It also correlates to a higher quantity of memorials with artistic decorative elements such as busts and statues, as will be discussed further below.

Table 4 Number of materials used as components of memorials in total sample and notable graves in each cemetery

Number of materials	Total Père Lachaise	'Notable graves' Père Lachaise	Total Highgate	'Notable graves' Highgate
1 or more	244 (100%)	25 (100%)	574 (100%)	71 (100%)
2 or more	174 (71%)	25 (100%)	183 (32%)	35 (49%)
3 or more	90 (37%)	18 (72%)	51 (9%)	11 (15%)
4 materials	18 (7%)	5 (20%)	6 (1%)	2 (3%)

The amount of White Marble used as Material 2, 3 or 4 is higher at Père Lachaise, because fewer gravestones there are made primarily from marble and so are more likely to have marble elements such as inset text panels added. Pink granite is rare as a secondary material at Père Lachaise but seen more at Highgate for elements such as columns and bases. There is a similar amount of grey granite as a secondary material in both samples, mostly commonly used for to provide strong bases in both cemeteries. Highgate has fewer iron elements – there are similar quantities of surviving railings in both cemeteries, but Highgate has fewer iron doors even when the catacombs are taken into account. There is also much less copper alloy seen in the Highgate sample, because statues and busts in bronze which are the height of artistry at Père Lachaise are not present in Highgate, where all the statues are stone. There are a highly decorated pair of bronze doors on the Pocklington mausoleum (HGE14.2, c. 1920) and 2 panels with relief lettering, one of which is on the Stevens monument (HGW30.1) but all of the other copper alloy elements are small- plaques, door handles and railing chains. However, we do see more Limestone used as a secondary element at Highgate, primarily as slabs or bases for monuments of more expensive stone, especially marble.

Decorative motifs

In both cemeteries we see a fairly standard repertoire of symbols, many of which are found in both as part of a shared Western European cultural tradition, making it easy for English visitors to Paris for example, to 'read' the gravestone motifs. There are however some differences in the amount and kinds of decoration found in the two samples.

The graves in the Père Lachaise sample are overall more highly decorated than those in the Highgate sample. This is partly due to the differences in memorial form, for example mausolea having more space for decorative elements than headstones, but the percentage of gravestones at Highgate which have no decorative motifs at all (44%), in comparison to only 21% undecorated graves at Père Lachaise suggests that there is a significant stylistic difference between the two cemeteries.

However, in both cemeteries, the level of decoration on the 'notable' graves is usually higher than those which surround them, suggesting that more thought and expense was employed in creatingmonuments which reflected the deceased for these individuals (see Figure 10 and 11)

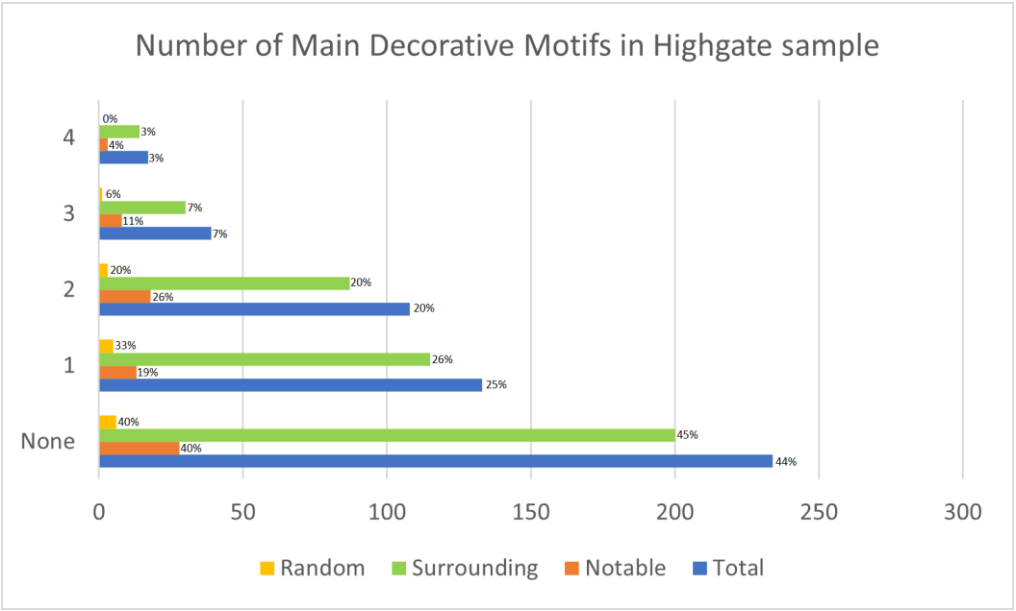

Figure 11 Number of main decorative motifs in Highgate sample, broken down into total (n=531), notable (n=70), surrounding (n=446), and random (n=15) samples

At both Père Lachaise and Highgate the symbols can be grouped into similar categories, but the proportions of each varies between the two cemeteries, as does the popularity of individual motifs as seen in Figure 12.

Symbols of mortality, such as winged hourglasses, inverted torches and urns, mostly taken from a classical repertoire are more common at Père Lachaise than at Highgate in all parts of the sample, and religious symbolism, which is almost exclusively Christian, is more common at Highgate in all parts of the sample. This dichotomy is particularly pronounced in the 'notable' graves sample at PèreLachaise which are particularly unlikely to feature religious symbolism, probably because having a largely secular memorial was more important for public figures, particularly those associated with politics and the French state at this time. In both cemeteries commemoration of the profession or achievements of the deceased through symbolism was rare except for the 'notable' graves, but the Père Lachaise sample was much more likely to include images of the deceased such as portraits, busts and statues which were very seldom seen at Highgate, but those which did occur were nearly all in the 'notable' sample. At Père Lachaise, the lineage or nationality of the deceased was more likely to be included for example using a crest, flag or decorative initials for the 'notable' dead in comparison to the rest of the sample, probably because the 'cult of the dead' aimed to make these figures into illustrious ancestors for not just their own families, but for the French people as a whole.In contrast, at Highgate lineage was more likely to be portrayed outside the 'notable' graves sample,because for these figures personal achievements may have been seen to be more important than wider family pride. Depictions of fauna were relatively rare but floral motifs were popular throughout both cemetery samples, with the exception of the 'notable' graves at Père Lachaise where they were underutilised, perhaps in favour of more specific and personal symbols. Although the broad categories show broad similarities, there are more differences in the relative popularity of different symbols, with some being specific to one country or another in these samples.

Among the mortality symbols drawn from the classical repertoire, the wreath, representing victory over death and inverted torches, a symbol of eternal life, are both popular in both cemeteries. Urns, which recall cremation in the classical world are also common in both samples, often draped at Highgate but left uncovered in Père Lachaise. Other than these similarities, there a number of distinct differences. In Père Lachaise, winged hourglasses, a reminder that time is fleeting, are one ofthe most common symbols of mortality, but no hourglasses are seen at Highgate.

In both cemeteries, simple Latin crosses are the most common single symbol, but some of the other religious symbolism shows differentiation, for example Celtic crosses were fairly rare at Père Lachaise, and much more common at Highgate, whereas Gothic crosses and Maltese Crosses are more common at Père Lachaise. At Père Lachaise there are some examples of the chi-rho symbol (a Christogram formed from the first 2 letters of the Greek word Christos), it does not appear at Highgate. In England, perhaps this symbol retained a Catholic association in the 19th century. The popularity of the IHS symbol (another Christogram derived from the first 3 letters of Jesus in Greek) at Highgate shows that this symbol had been rehabilitated by British Anglicans for use on gravestones in this period, but this symbol not seen in the Père Lachaise sample. Clasped hands were often depicted with the phrase 'til we meet again' and express hope of a heavenly reunion with family. There are five examples at Highgate dating from the 1880s to 1930s (two undated examples may be older), but the symbol doesn't appear at Père Lachaise until a single instance in the 1990s. There are also 2 Stars of David and a depiction of the buddha in the Père Lachaise sample, but no non-Christian symbolism on any of the Highgate sample graves.

Floral symbolism is seen in both cemetery samples, some of which are very stylised but there are also many gravestones where an attempt at realism has been attempted and so where possible the kind of flower depicted has been identified, because individual flowers were associated with different meanings. Roses were the most popular in both cemeteries, associated with love, but at Highgate there are also a number of Passionflowers, which were a religious symbol of the Passion ofChrist, although this was not used in the Père Lachaise sample. Smaller numbers of other flowers such as poppies (linked to sleep) were seen in both samples.

As discussed above, images of the deceased are quite rare at Highgate, with just a few examples of portraits and busts. At Père Lachaise these appear in greater numbers and there are also a number of full-length sculptures in the sample – some showing the deceased alive and some dead. Many of the sculptures at Père Lachaise are by known sculptors such as David D'Angers, making Père Lachaise into an outdoor art gallery of some prestige, a place where the names and the faces of the illustrious dead could be remembered. It may seem odd that in both cemeteries monuments to known sculptors like David D'Angers and Alfred Stevens did not include sculptures but may be consistent with wider trends for these individuals to be marked by simple and modest memorials using high quality materials as was noted by Physick at Kensal Green (2001, 242).

Authors writing about British cemeteries were less likely to stress this as a function, emphasising other learning opportunities such as the moral value of cemeteries, or as places to learn about trees and plants, for example Loudon (1843) who advocated for cemeteries which could function as arboretums. However, the inclusion of a small number of images, all for well-known figures, suggests that encouraging remembrance of their appearance wasa motive at Highgate too, and this is corroborated by the creation of a large bust of Karl Marx for hisnew memorial.

There are some symbols of national pride in both cemeteries – French flags at Père Lachaise, and a Polish flag at Highgate, but most of the symbols relating to lineage and affiliation are related to families or military regiments. Post-revolutionary France had a changed social structure, but new titles were created, for example for the Napoleonic generals Ney and Massena, and so commemoration of illustrious families and antecedents did continue. At Père Lachaise the is most commonly done by creating a decorative motif using the surname initial on the monument. This is rarer at Highgate where we see more 'shields with design' sometimes featuring coats of arms which gained popularity in the 18th and 19th century, a period known as the 'Decadence'. Arms celebrated family history and conferred a mark of gentility (Pine and Hogarth 2005). For those without the necessary family connections or the means to purchase a baronetcy, non-heraldic family crests werealso popular. The French ideal of egalité clearly held little sway in Victorian Britain.

A range of occupation symbols are used at Père Lachaise, most commonly lyres for musicians, paint pallets for artists and books for writers. There is one paint pallet at Highgate for artist George Hering and a book for Frederick Warne the bookseller, but there are no musicians in the sample. Many of the other occupation symbols in each cemetery are very personal such as the statue of Nero for George Wombwell (HGW3.1) at Highgate, or the engraving of the transportation of the obelisk on the Le Bas obelisk (PLC18.8). In both samples this is an area where great creativity was used to personally commemorate the achievements of the deceased, showing how important this was to thebereaved responsible for these monuments, this is especially true for the 'notable' dead whose monuments are more likely to include these motifs.

Inscriptions

The main difference in inscriptions between Père Lachaise and Highgate cemeteries is of course the language. At Père Lachaise the vast majority of the inscriptions were in French, with a small number in other languages for all or part of the inscription; Latin, Mandarin, Hebrew, and two graves in English. At Highgate, only 4 graves had a Latin inscription in conjunction with English (plus 12 graves with R.I.P which can be read in English or Latin) and were no other languages used in the sample graves, with even the Polish exiles writing in the tongue of the 'foreign but friendly land' where they were interred. Although these small samples cannot represent the diversity of burials at either cemetery, it seems likely that the broad trends are not dissimilar in either case, because the lingua franca of each country is the obvious choice for an inscription even if that is not the first language of the person commemorated.

In both cemeteries we see a repertoire of formulaic phrases used for inscriptions and although there are differences between these, they tend to cover common themes as can be seen below in Table 5 and 6. The differences can reveal some differences in attitudes towards death in the two samples.

At Père Lachaise the usual convention on most memorials is to have a single introductory phrase for the whole monument, but at Highgate it was usual to have an introduction before each individual name, which probably explains the most popular phrases from each sample. At Highgate it was 'Also of' which was often used for additional names on monuments after the first inscription and so appears the majority of the sample gravestones. At Père Lachaise, the most common was 'Famille' followed by the surname of the family often appearing above the doors of mausoleums and on the front or top of other monument types. The popularity of this inscription may have been linked to the importance of family graves as a symbol of family unity in France at this time. Inscriptions for 'Family Graves' were comparatively rare at Highgate, despite most graves being privately owned and used by members of a single family, perhaps due to the preference for individual inscriptions over collective ones.

At Père Lachaise the next most popular introductory phrase is 'ici repose' (here reposes/lies) which has connotations of rest and sleep. These kinds of sentiments aren't expressed through introductory phrases at Highgate, but death terminology such as 'fell asleep' and 'entered into rest' convey the same ideas, showing that death as sleep was a shared metaphor in both countries at this time.

Another common introductory phrase used at Père Lachaise is 'Sepulchre' (burial place, grave) which is more explicit about death, as are some of the inscriptions at Highgate which mention the body, ashes or mortal remains in the introductory phrase. At Highgate, these examples were rare and often on the graves on known Agnostics/Atheists. This may correlate with a secular cemetery like Père Lachaise containing a higher proportion of these inscriptions. Notably, introductions and death terminology at Père Lachaise do not contain any explicitly religious phrases, but some of these are relatively popular in the Highgate sample before 1900 especially 'Sacred to the memory of' and 'Fell asleep in Jesus'.

Allusions to memory and remembrance are very common in the Highgate sample, and much rarer in the Père Lachaise sample, and phrases which liken death to a journey such as ‘departed this life’ and ‘passed on’ are totally absent. This suggests there may be differences in the way death is viewed between the two cemeteries. Were monuments seen as a physical embodiment of dead loved ones who remained present there in France, whereas in England they were viewed more as an aide de memoire for the departed who had gone onto another place?

Despite the importance of ‘Famille’ inscriptions at Père Lachaise, or perhaps because of it, recording the actual family relationships between those interred was less common than in the Highgate sample. At Highgate they appeared in 58% of legible inscriptions, whilst only 17% of the Père Lachaise sample included them. In both cemeteries, women were much more likely to have their family ties listed than men. At Highgate there were nearly twice as many women as men with a stated relationship (637 women and 334 men, see table 29) and at Père Lachaise it was even more stark with 159 women and 14 men (see table 16, volume 1).

In both cemeteries, the most commonly stated relationship was ‘wife’, whilst inscriptions of ‘husband’ were comparatively rare. At Père Lachaise inscriptions for ‘widow’ were the next mostcommon, but at Highgate it was ‘daughter’ (which was rarely seen at Père Lachaise with only 3 examples) and then ‘widow’ as the third most common. At Père Lachaise these relationships were often given using titles of Madame and Veuve (usually abbreviated as Mme and Vve) but at Highgatethey were written out in full e.g. ‘wife of the above’. At Highgate it was quite common for both sons and daughters to be listed, sometimes with just the name of the father but often with the name of both parents. At Père Lachaise, although both relationship ‘son’ and ‘daughter’ were rarely listed, women did often have their paternal family ties stated in the form of their maiden name, because inFrance whilst a woman was often known as Madame Husbands Name, legally she retains her own name. The use of ‘Née’ followed by Maiden names is very rare in the Highgate sample but ‘daughter of’ was used fairly commonly for adult women and so this information would therefore be included. A few instances of non-family relationships were recorded at Highgate, such as friends, but none were listed at Père Lachaise although sometimes there are people with different surnames whose relationship to the original nuclear family is not clarified. It seems that in the Highgate sample, the exact relationships between those listed on the monument were important, to document the family history and other connections, but in the Père Lachaise sample everyone was embraced by the ‘Famille’ umbrella.

In both cemeteries there was a difference between the way the ‘notable’ men were treated in comparison to the rest of the sample in their cemetery. There are only 14 men who have a family relationship listed in the Père Lachaise sample, but two of them are in the ‘notable’ sample, both ofwhom are described as ‘sons’, perhaps because of family pride in a famous son. The opposite was true in the Highgate sample, where the ‘notable’ men were very unlikely to have a family relationship listed in comparison to the rest of the sample, showing that for these individuals, personal achievements were usually the most important, rather than their family connections. In both cemeteries, the ‘notable’ women were likely to have a personal relationship listed. At Père Lachaise, the only woman in the ‘notable’ sample is Heloise, remembered as one half of a pair of ill- fated lovers, and so her commemoration as ‘wife of Abelard’ is not unexpected. At Highgate, the factthat four of the ‘notable’ women have family relationships listed and no mention of their own achievements, a direct contrast to their male peers, is also perhaps not unexpected in the social context. The only woman in the Highgate sample whose grave does not include a family relationship,acknowledges her career by listing her male pen name.

Acknowledgements of personal and professional achievements or titles are one of the main categories of additional information that was included in epitaphs in both cemeteries, with theothers being address or place of residence, and other biographical information. See figure 13.

In both cemeteries, inscriptions for the ‘notable’ dead were generally more likely to contain additional information in all categories compared to the rest of their samples. A similar proportion of the total samples included a title or information about profession, and in both cases, this was heavily concentrated in the ‘notable’ dead, with this information included for over 60% of them in both samples. At Père Lachaise it was very unusual for an address or place of residence to be given (2% of the total sample) and more common at Highgate (12% of the total sample), but in both cemeteries, 19% of the ‘notable’ people had inscriptions which included an Address or place of residence. At Père Lachaise these inscriptions usually just list ‘Paris’ but at Highgate it is more common for full addresses to be included. The inclusion of other biographical information was more common at PèreLachaise than at Highgate, usually place of birth, place of death or maiden name for women. At Highgate, it was usually place of birth, place of death or information about the deceased being buried elsewhere. The 'notable' dead in both cemeteries were more likely to have this kind of additional information inscribed than the surrounding graves around them. Longer epitaphs were also more common for the notable dead than all other categories in both samples, although the random sample at Père Lachaise was somewhat skewed by the epitaphs for air crash victims (PLC40). The longer epitaphs in both samples can be broken down into similar categories, as shown below intable 7.

Table 7 longer epitaphs by category in both samples.

	Sentimental	Religious	Life and Achievements	Death	Patriotic	Memorial erected by
Père Lachaise	55 (23%)	81 (33%)	96 (40%)	0 (0%)	5 (2%)	6 (2%)
Highgate	155 (32%)	294 (61%)	8 (2%)	7 (1%)	4 (1%)	10 (2%)

Although it was almost as common in both cemeteries to have an inscription which included titles or profession, it was rare for more detailed information about careers and achievements to be listed at Highgate, but much more usual at Père Lachaise, where sometimes this information extended to the names of books, paintings or musical compositions, or even long lists of military campaigns or projects. In both samples, the 'notable' dead were more likely than average to include information about their life and achievements, as would be expected. At Highgate epitaphs were slightly more likely to be sentimental, and twice as likely to be religious, in line with the rest of the findings that religious expression was less common at Père Lachaise overall.

The kinds of sentiments expressed were broadly similar at both cemeteries, praising the dead for their friendship, caring natures, and good qualities, or expressing love and regret, but references to rest, sleep and peace are more common at Highgate. In both cemeteries, sentimental inscriptions which speak of familial and romantic love are found often – with phrases like 'dearly loved', 'beloved', 'cher' and 'bonne' appearing in many inscriptions, tying in with Tarlow's findings on Orkney that sentiment and emotion were the primary expression of most monuments (1999, 173-176).

There are some Mandarin and Hebrew inscriptions at Père Lachaise, but the vast majority of the religious inscriptions are Christian, often short and formulaic e.g. 'Priez pour lui' and 'De Profundis'.At Highgate, there is more variety and longer passages, especially bible quotes, are more popular. For the 'notable' dead at Highgate, religious inscriptions are as common as sentimental ones, but only one 'notable' grave at Père Lachaise had a partly religious epitaph, that of Oscar Wilde, who being Irish and having lived in England for most of his life was more likely to be commemorated following British conventions. It seems that in Highgate people were very free to express their religious sentiment and or lack thereof in the case of Agnostics, but at Père Lachaise expressions offaith were somewhat discouraged, especially for public figures.

Having compared the monumentality of the two cemeteries, this chapter will now more fully examine the factors which affected it, especially for the 'notable' individuals.

Appendix 4.3.3 Factors affecting the style and form of monuments to 'notable' individuals at Père Lachaise and Highgate

As discussed in Chapters 6 and 7, there are some common factors which are likely to have influenced the monumentality selected for the 'significant' dead. These can be divided into four main categories: wealth, status, family ties and religious belief.

Display of wealth

Displays of wealth were encouraged by funerary practice in both France and England during the period in question. In both countries, funerals were divided into classes based on income and social status. In France this was part of a strictly controlled funeral industry, making it hard to subvert these conventions. In London, the funeral trade was not strictly controlled, but the competitive funeral market in London had much the same effect – encouraging people to spend on funerals in line with their social status and ability to pay in order to maximise income and perpetuate the traditions. Therefore, funerals were a site of conspicuous consumption in both countries. This was especially important in post-revolutionary France where displays of lavish wealth in life were not always approved of.

For public figures this expenditure on funerals and monumentality would have been even more expected, as to subvert the expectations of the time would have attracted significant social stigma, perhaps even public outcry, in a time when spending on funerals was perceived as a mark of dignity and respect for the deceased. For those who paying for funerary display, every aspect could be a way to advertise success and wealth. Monuments on well-chosen grave plots were an ideal place to display wealth because they were the most durable and publicly visible. By purchasing the best plots and erecting large, tall or exceptionally artistic memorials, perhaps using expensive or exotic materials, was an ideal way for families not only to mark the life of the deceased, but to display financial resources. One well documented example of this is the Beer Mausoleum at Highgate, but there are likely to be other graves where investment in memorials was partly as a conspicuous display of wealth to the visitors to the cemetery.

Display of status

At Highgate, the funeral and monument of Tom Sayers, paid for by public subscription, showed that it was important to provide a funeral of standing for well-known figures, even if their private resources were not sufficient to provide it. There were also monuments paid for by others among the 'notables' at Père Lachaise, including two paid for by public subscription and one paid for by anonymous donation. In Père Lachaise we also see state funerals and monuments paid for by government decree. Display of social standing and status was also a function of monuments in both cemeteries at this time, especially for public figures.

The graves in the 'notable' sample, are of people who had high social standing at the time of their death, they had a public profile and therefore as well as functioning as a private place of grief for those who knew them personally, their monuments also serve a public function. Monuments were erected to help keep their memory alive in the minds of visitors, and so often include commemoration of profession or personal achievements either through the inscription or the symbolism of the monument, and often both, as we have seen above. The use of portraits, busts and sculptures was not only especially eye catching and a display of wealth, but also kept an idealised image of the deceased visible in the public realm. This was more common at Père Lachaise than Highgate, which may be because although people of high social status were influential in the public sphere in both Britain and France, this was heightened by the secular 'cult of the dead' in France, where Great Men were elevated to a position where their memory would be preserved in the national consciousness, as 'ancestors' to inspire and guide.

Family ties

However, we should not downplay the importance of the personal either. As we have seen, family graves were of increasing importance in both Paris and London during the 19th and early 20th centuries. Cemeteries provided lots of families, especially from the emerging middle classes, with a chance to own property in the form of the family plot, and remain united in death, in a way which had not been possible in earlier churchyards, at a time when other forms of private property might still be beyond the grasp of the majority. The commemoration of the family, either through collective inscriptions as was common at Père Lachaise, or by detailing personal relationships as waspreferred at Highgate, shows that the monument had a role to play in maintaining family unity and relationships with the deceased. Many gravestones in both cemeteries have inscriptions which list the personal qualities of the deceased, and express sentiments of grief, loss and regret by those who knew them best.

For the ‘notable’ dead, the marking of these personal relationships might sometimes be secondary to more public functions, such as having fewer family relationships listed, but we still find many monuments with sentiment inscriptions and expressions of family grief. Those who had less choice in the monuments erected (for example those paid for public subscription or third parties) are often those where private feelings are least considered, except the monuments at Père Lachaise raised to those who were long dead such as La Fontaine and Moliere for whom their public image was all that remained.

Although the secular management of Parisian cemeteries downplays Christian belief, we know that family graves and particularly mausolea were used as a space not only for private grief, but also for prayer, some even imploring visitors to do the same and ‘Priez pour lui’ or ‘elle’. In Highgate, many graves express hope of reunion, not just in the grave, but also in heaven.

Religious belief

Overall, there is much more religious symbolism at Highgate, which is as would be expected in a cemetery where freedom of religious belief for different Christian denominations was considered from the initial design. The inclusion of some Jewish graves in the Père Lachaise sample is similarly to be expected as an area for Jewish burial was always provided, and after 1882 Jewish graves were not to be spatially separated from other internments.

The ’notable’ graves are less likely to include religious content than the ‘surrounding graves’ in both cemeteries, but this is a particularly stark contrast at Père Lachaise where religious inscriptions are almost entirely absent from the ‘notable’ monuments and religious symbolism is much reduced. In some cases at Highgate, we know that the lack of religious sentiments is deliberate indication of the agnosticism/atheism of their occupants such as George Elliot and Herbert Spencer. At Père Lachaise, there were also free-thinkers, but in other cases it might be simply that it was not always politically expedient to display personal religious belief in a society that was frequently strongly anti-clerical.

Appendix 4.3.4 Wider effects of monuments to the famous dead at Père Lachaise and Highgate

This chapter has shown that the monuments to the ‘notable’ dead in both cemeteries are atypical of the wider monumentality, often showing more individualisation and sometimes influential on the location or style of other monuments. Like other fashions of the day (clothing, architecture, food) it is likely that the wealthy and well-known were trend-setters when it came to funerary practice too.

The specific impact of the monuments to the 'notable' dead is hard to measure, particularly in a data sample which has a deep but narrow focus. However, there is one area where we do clearly see the effects of monuments to the 'notable' dead in both cemeteries. That is in the clustering of graves belonging to people who knew each other in life, or who were believed to be 'kindred spirits' in death; sharing similar professions, worldviews or ideals.

At Père Lachaise, this is clear and well documented in the early years of the cemetery's development, growing from the deliberate introduction of Moliere, La Fontaine, Heloise and Abelardto the cemetery. We have also seen several areas where this continues, for example the Rendezvous des Braves where military burials are clustered. At Highgate, there was no deliberate policy which would have encouraged the formation of these types of clusters, and so although there is some grouping of the elite dead, it is less distinct than at Père Lachaise, with only the graves surrounding George Elliot and on White Eagle Hill showing a strong clustering effect. Whilst at Père Lachaise some monuments which had clearly influenced the style and decoration of others were found, the sample at Highgate found far less conclusive evidence of this, perhaps because fashions there weremore strongly influenced by the design catalogues of rival stonemasons, vying for business.

Appendix 4.4 Summary

Père Lachaise is often cited as the most influential cemetery on practice in Europe and North America, and although other landscape models certainly had an effect on the design of some British cemeteries, there are also a number of documented cases where Père Lachaise was explicitly used as an inspiration. At Highgate, and in many of the other Magnificent 7 London cemeteries we find clear similarities between the sites and layouts chosen, and therefore cannot dispute Père Lachaise as an important landscape model.

There are clear differences in the monumentality between the two cemeteries, some of which are probably broadly representative of the differences between practice in London and Paris, such as the British preference for headstones, and the Parisian use of local stone for the majority of monuments. However, there are also many similarities due to shared stylistic traditions in Western Europe, and also similar attitudes towards death and respectful treatment of the dead. In both cemeteries, the grave locations and monumentality chosen for the 'notable' dead make a clear contrast to the graves that surround them, relating to their dual function as private places of grief and also public sites of memory, frequently through the use of larger and more highly decorated monuments which highlight the personal achievements of the deceased, to ensure that they continue to be remembered by visitors.

Appendix 5—Phenomenological approaches

A phenomenological approach potentially offers ways to explore how people understood their world, their systems of belief and so on, through the immersion of the researcher in the landscape (Tilley 1994). Where possible, in order to avoid being too subjective (a common criticism of phenomenological approaches), material evidence and observer experiences should be organised using documented accounts of known journeys through these spaces, and supplemented by historic as well as contemporary images, to create data-rich accounts (cf. Ashmore 2010, 171). This use of documentary sources alongside phenomenology has been applied to churches as points in the sacred landscape by Corcos (2001), showing the value of using maps with routes plotted to follow probable journeys.

The two contrasting illustrative examples described below, one from Père Lachaise and one from Highgate were chosen to contrast private and intimate experiences of grief for the notable dead with the public appeal of monuments to them as visitor attractions.

Appendix 5.1—A prestigious funeral at Père Lachaise in 1850

A funeral procession approaches the main gate along the Boulevard de Menilmontant. It approaches slowly as the pallbearers walk alongside the hearse, carrying its silver tassels. The cemetery walls are high, dividing the cemetery from the world outside, partly to protect the living from the dangers of decomposition, and also to ensure the peaceful rest of the dead. The streets have been lined with spectators, but the crowd inside the cemetery will be more select. Control is exercised over who can enter on these occasions and the 'portiers' will have turned away the rabble at the gate.

Approaching the gate there is a restricted view of the cemetery through the aperture, a glimpse of a tree lined avenue and the chapel above. The gates are adorned with winged hourglasses and flaming torch designs on the gateposts. They remind that though life is fleeting, there is the promise of eternal life. The carved inscriptions ''spes illorum immortalitate plena est' (Their hope is full of immortality, trans. J Wall 2022) and 'Qui credit inme etiamsimortuus fuerit vivet' (he who believes in death shall live, trans. J Wall 2022) carry much the same sentiment for those who can read Latin. For those who can't, the association of this language with arcane learning and religious services, along with the carved symbols, act as reminders that this is a threshold where you are leaving the mundane world behind.

Once inside, the overall impression is of a garden, with trees and scattered tombs rising up the hillside, conjuring up images of Elysian fields or Arcadian paradise, where death is a rest or eternal sleep. The procession turns off the Avenue Principale, follows the Avenue Lateral du Nord and then winds the way up the hill to the graveside. Away from the main avenues which are already lined with fine tombs, much of the area to the left on the way to the grave is occupied by fosses communes with their small wooden crosses and other temporary markers which like the bones will be removed once their 5-year stay is up. The resting place of these ordinary Parisians is not the destination for this funeral. The grave this procession approaches has been purchased and will soon be surrounded by railings to mark the extent of the concession. Other grave owners have opted for low wooden fences with flowers and shrubs around the stones, or built mausolea, which act as private chapels where they can kneel to pray behind the safety of an iron door.

The roads are rough and increasingly narrow as the route continues. In this case, there is no need to visit the chapel, a service having been conducted at the church of Saint-Philippe du Roule already, and so the chapel and its open forecourt are passed by on the right without stopping. The main landmark, glimpsed occasionally through the trees as you climb is the Beaujour memorial – standing like a lighthouse, 60ft tall made from pale gleaming limestone.

The horses and mourners on foot both struggle as the ground is slippery and wet from the recent rain. Later, when the cemetery has expanded, steps will be added to these steep sections and processions will take a longer but less precarious route. The gravesite is close to transverse allée, above which a newly purchased extension is being laid out. This is almost at the highest point of the cemetery, and already there are a number of other fine tombs nearby, including the pedestal tomb of Casimir Delavigne with a draped mourning figure looking down as you pass (figure 17).

The graves are in neat rows and well-spaced with borders of stone around them, but so large is the crowd which has gathered around the grave that they are standing on as well as between the tombs, hoping for the best view. The sun is setting as the coffin is lowered into the grave, a final prayer is said, and Victor Hugo gives a eulogy, for this is the funeral of his friend, the writer Honoré de Balzac. His wife and friends are among the mourners, with Alexandre Dumas also serving as a pallbearer alongside Victor Hugo, but there are also politicians here to celebrate more what he symbolised as a French literary great, more than the life or loss of the man himself. The view from the graveside is of Paris in the setting sun, forming a link between the man and the city. Many mourners will be reminded of Blazac's character Rastingnac who stands alone in the cemetery, looking out at Paris after the poorly attended funeral of Goriot (Balzac 1834). Balzac will never be alone for long, even after the funeral has ended. His grave will soon be marked by a pedestal topped with a bust by David d'Angers along with a book and quill to remind visitors of his great works. Within 5 years, the spot immediately across the path will be home to fellow writer Gérald de Nerval, and Balzac's face will seem to be among the crowd at his funeral to welcome a kindred spirit to their shared resting place.

Much of this imagined journey is based on Hugo's own account of the funeral (1907), and therefore may have been somewhat romanticised or distorted by recollection long after the fac. It appears to be accurate, containing geographical details within the text, such as the tomb of Casimir Delavigne. Checking maps of the cemetery from around 1850 and visiting the cemetery today also allow a full picture to be built where there are gaps and to corroborate the account. For example, although the trees are more mature than they would have been in 1850, it is still possible to see Paris between them even in the fading light at sunset (figure 156).

Appendix 5. 2. A leisurely stroll in Highgate Cemetery

When entering the West cemetery on foot, most visitors pass through the stone arch under the sign 'London Cemetery Company', built into this gothic building with its central bell tower and chapels either side. This arrangement with the chapels at the entrance means that the cemetery could never be mistaken for a park and encourages visitors to behave with propriety during their leisure time in the cemetery. The old ground has a high wall all around it, dividing the sacred from the mundane and warding off the old lingering spectres of body snatchers and vandals. As well as this arch and a larger gate to the right of the chapels for carriages, there is also a gate further up Swains Lane whichhas a small lodge inside. At night the gates are locked and admittance during the day can be restricted if there is a large funeral happening or if there are concerns about rowdy or disreputable people trying to gain access.

The imposing archway casts a permanent shade, meaning that visitors step out of the light and into this dark portal when entering the cemetery, leaving their everyday lives behind. The Anglican chapel is to the right side of the arch and the Dissenters to the left. When there are no services, it is possible for visitors to look inside. A quick glance would reveal that they are quite similar in appearance, but the Anglican chapel is larger with a hydraulic bier for lowering coffins into the tunnel to the East Cemetery and coloured stained glass in the windows. The Dissenters chapel has plain glass, reflecting the simpler tastes of many nonconformist congregations.

From this point, the suggested route takes in a loop of the circular path, encouraging the visitor to take in the fine sculptures, pause to observe flitting butterflies and catch glimpses of the lower cemetery through the trees. Some more inscriptions are highlighted including the architect James Bunstone Bunning and two tragic stories of children's deaths. The guide encourages the viewer to take in the beauty of nature and the artistic monuments, whilst savouring the morally improving messages of the stones. Perhaps more avaricious visitors will be inspired more by the wealth displayed by the finely cut stone, rather than by the symbolism.

The route then progresses to the junction where three paths come together, known as Comfort's Corner. The landscape opens up into a plateau here, revealing for the first time a wide vista of many gravestones. The route suggested then includes a stop where there is a view out of the cemetery across Holloway below, before it continues up the hill. Trips off the main avenues involve following small paths which will later be infilled or winding between the closely packed graves.

Then comes the entrance to the Egyptian Avenue, with the architecture described as solemn and 'singularly appropriate' as the association between Egypt and pyramids and tombs in the public mind is strong. The tunnel is dark and footsteps echo in the silence, creating an atmosphere where death must be contemplated. The tunnel is lined with family catacombs, their heavy iron doors closed and locked, keys are held by cemetery staff and the family. The family can gain admittance tothis private inner sanctum to visit their relatives if they wish, knowing that their loved ones rest secure from unwanted intrusions. At the end of the tunnel, there is a view up to the Cedar of Lebanon in the centre of the circle. This magnificent tree is much older than the cemetery, adding to its associations with endurance, eternallife and immortality. There are also glimpses of the many fine tombs above. The stairs which exit to the surface are on the opposite side of the circle, leading back up into the sunlight, with the terrace catacombs directly ahead.

The guidebook doesn't include a trip onto the roof of this structure but does commend the panoramic view of London available from some vantages nearby, as well as the monuments in this area which are of the highest quality and include every style including Gothic, Romanesque, Grecian, Egyptian and mixtures dictated by individual tastes. Some are adorned with Christian iconography or weeping classical figures as suits the temperament of those commemorated. When looking out across the cemetery, there are more graves than meet the eye – most visitors being totally unaware that some of the smaller paths they walk on, or empty plots they pass are actually the locations of common graves, which although unmarked offer Londoners on ordinary incomes the opportunity to show their respectability and join this community of the dead.

The path which leads to the top gate is followed as far as the Lillywhite memorial before turning back. A chestnut tree with a seat beneath it is suggested as a place to pause. This is the beginning of the row which unobtrusively screens the Dissenters Division.

Visitors following the guidebook are finally instructed to enter this area, with some suggested stops as they wind their way down the hill towards the courtyard and their exit. The individual visitor following this route is likely to find different reasons to linger at some memorials or vantage points. One may look up at the lion Nero and remember a visit to Wombwell's menagerie, whilst another sees a touching tribute to a young child and is reminded of their own grief at the death of a sibling long ago.

This route (figure 26), extrapolated from the directions given by William Justyne in his guidebook (1865) is supplemented in this account by historical images and observations made on visits to the cemetery. It suggests one possible itinerary for a visitor wishing to take in the charms of Highgate, but there were many possible routes, which would change over time. For example, Justyne briefly mentioned the East Cemetery, but did not include a visit, as at this time it was still largely in its infancy.
